A search of CBP databases has identified records responsive to your request, 703 pages of which are now being produced Portions of this release have been withheld pursuant to Title 5 U.S.C. § 552 (b)(6), (b)(b(7)(C), and (b)(7)(E).

Uploaded to your FOIAonline account are 703 pages with certain information withheld as described below:

FOIA Exemption (b)(6) exempts from disclosure personnel or medical files and similar files the release of which would cause a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. This requires a balancing of the public's right to disclosure against the individual's right privacy. The types of documents and/or information that we have withheld may consist of names, email addresses, alien numbers, birth dates, and phone numbers, or various other documents and/or information belonging to a third party that are considered personal. The privacy interests of the individuals in the records you have requested outweigh any minimal public interest in disclosure of the information. Any private interest you may have in that information does not factor into the aforementioned balancing test.

FOIA Exemption (b)(7)(C) protects records or information compiled for law enforcement purposes that could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. This exemption takes particular note of the strong interests of individuals, whether they are suspects, witnesses, or investigators, in not being unwarrantably associated with alleged criminal activity. That interest extends to persons who are not only the subjects of the investigation, but those who may have their privacy invaded by having their identities and information about them revealed in connection with an investigation. Based upon the traditional recognition of strong privacy interest in law enforcement records, categorical withholding of information that identifies third parties in law enforcement records is ordinarily appropriate.

FOIA Exemption (b)(7)(E) protects records compiled for law enforcement purposes, the release of which would disclose techniques and/or procedures for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions, or would disclose guidelines for law enforcement investigations or prosecutions if such disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law. CBP has determined that disclosure could reasonably be expected to risk circumvention of the law.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.

- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

   (WBTS-TV; 20k uvm; Newton, MA) … Richard Lardner

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

2. Major cocaine bust at Sarita checkpoint
   (KIII-TV; 66k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Michael Gibson

VIDEO: Border patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint said one of their K-9's sniffed out a trunk full of cocaine Wednesday morning. Nearly six million dollars worth of cocaine was discovered during the stop. Kiii News reporter Michael Gibson was at the checkpoint to meet with agents about the incident. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. Investigators believe the drugs were smuggled across an unprotected section of the border and then loaded into the Mercedes.

Tell Him Where He Is
(BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

4. Border Patrol Agent Hospitalized after Illegal Immigrant Speeds Through Checkpoint
(Breitbart; 19.1M uvm) … Bob Price

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

5. Border Patrol agents discover drugs taped to 17-year-old girl's body
   (KGTV-TV; 2.1M uvm; San Diego, CA) … Jermaine Ong

A 17-year-old girl was taken into custody at the El Centro border checkpoint after U.S. officials said Border Patrol agents discovered small packages of methamphetamine taped to her body. Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to DEA officials. Officials did not say if the other vehicle occupants were taken into custody.

   (Grand Forks Herald; 837k uvm; Grand Forks, ND) … April Baumgarten

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security) partners to disrupt one of the most dangerous criminal organizations in the United States," Chief Patrol Agent Aaron Heitke, commander of the Grand Forks Sector, said in a statement. "This arrest is the direct result from of information passed from Immigration and Customs Enforcement and a call from a concerned citizen."

7. Man surrenders at Border Patrol checkpoint following I-25 pursuit
   (Las Cruces Sun-News; 310k uvm; Las Cruces, NM)

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

8. K-9 leads Border Patrol agents to discovery of more than 180 pounds of cocaine
   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Alexandria Rodriguez

VIDEO: An alert from a Border Patrol K-9 in Kingsville led to the discovery of more than 180 pounds of cocaine at a checkpoint Wednesday. The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. The K-9 alerted an agents to a delivery truck, which led to further inspection, the release states. Agents then found nine packages of methamphetamine, worth more than $260,000, concealed in liquid foam, according to the release.

9. Border Patrol nabs two suspected MS-13 gang members
   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) …Chris Ramirez

VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

(Portland Press Herald; 2.1M uvm; Portland, OR) … Phil Whipple

For Farmington native Cassius Clark, the anticipation leading up to Saturday's annual Pro All Stars Series Mega-Meltdown 300 at Hickory Motor Speedway in North Carolina has turned to stress. The team for which Clark drives, King Racing, owned by former racer and Canadian businessman Rollie MacDonald, is stuck at the Canadian border with the car and all of the equipment necessary to run this weekend's race. "They've been delayed at the border cross at Houlton since Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m.," Clark said on the phone from North Carolina. "There was a practice session here yesterday, and there is more on tap for today. It's a 20-hour drive from Houlton to get here, so I sure hope they get released soon." Two other race teams had similar difficulties, Clark said, but were allowed to pass after a lengthy delay. U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

11. City officials get a tour of the international bridges
(KGNS-TV; 87k uvm; Laredo, TX) … Phil Whipple

VIDEO:A tour of bridge one and two was given to city officials on both sides of the border as they took a look at the status of the ongoing construction project. According to CBP, construction at both br1idge one and two is coming along fine. Congressman Henry Cuellar, Mayor Pete Saenz, and Nuevo Laredo and Laredo officials toured both facilities with U.S. General Services Administration and Customs and Border Protection. The project is aimed towards increasing efficiency and improving safety and security for vehicle and pedestrian processing. These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

A U.S. man is now in jail after Canada Border Services Agency discovered he had an outstanding felony warrant from Washington State. U.S. Customs and Border Protection issued a news release Friday afternoon title “No shirt, no service, no Canada,” saying the Tacoma man arrived northbound at the Peace Arch (Douglas) crossing in South Surrey, shirtless, and told officers he was heading to Toronto to visit friends. The release says that during a search of a rental vehicle, CBSA found small amounts of meth. After being returned to Blaine, officers confirmed the 23-year-old had a felony warrant from the Washington State Department of Corrections for robbery and escape from community custody, which was issued Nov. 13. “The co-operation between three government agencies is priceless,” U.S. CBP area port director Kenneth Williams said in the release. “CBSA, CBP and the sheriff’s office worked as a team to get this suspected criminal off the street.”

VIDEO: President Donald Trump is demanding Congress fund the construction of a wall along America’s border with Mexico. Work has already begun, with eight prototypes of new structures recently being showcased in San Diego. In the new series "America's Wall," KPBS and inewsource obtained previously unseen federal documents that detail the existing barriers along the border built under several previous administrations. The series also profiles people on both sides of the border, and both sides of a contentious issue.

14. Fisher's border wall prototype complete on Southern border
(Dickinson Press; 192k uvm; Dickinson, ND) … Grady McGregor

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(Rio Grande Guardian; 9k uvm; McAllen, TX) … Patricia Martinez

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. “Pharr does a great job over there, but it’s one bridge,” said Darling. “There’s just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge.” Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and southbound, Darling said: “I am shooting for the end of 2018. That is why we want to get the design done and get construction going. We are working on that, state monies, federal monies. They have to get their act together in Washington and set a budget and get some funding (going). We will get it done.

(Seattle PI; 4.7M uvm; Seattle WA)

Nonstop flights from Seattle to Dublin will start next spring. The Seattle Times reports Irish carrier Aer Lingus said Friday the service will begin May 18, 2018. The service will be provided four times a week. Because Dublin airport has its own U.S. Customs and Border Protection facility, passengers and their luggage will be pre-cleared in Ireland before departure, with no need to go through passport control on arrival in Seattle. This will be the first pre-cleared trans-Atlantic flight to fly into Seattle. Aer Lingus also will provide Seattle passengers connections through Dublin to 24 U.K. and European cities.

17. CBP gives tips for faster entry times during holiday season
(KGBT-TV; 298k uvm; Harlingen, TX) … Jolanie Martinez

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall’s multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. “A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online,” Saenz said. “They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. “At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."

(Brownsville Herald; 75k uvm; Brownsville, TX) … Cristina M. Garcia

Federal and local agencies were rivals Friday during the 3rd annual South Texas Police K-9 Competition held at the Rio Grande Valley Livestock Show Grounds in Mercedes. Valley law enforcement agencies and others, along with their K-9s, competed in timed narcotic article and vehicle searches, the obedience and confidence course, and criminal apprehension…If you compete and your dog doesn't do so well, that motivates you," Hidalgo County Sheriff's Office K-9 trainer Javier Solis said… U.S. Border Patrol's K-9, Billy-B, was named top dog in the patrol competition. A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. The U.S. Border Patrol was awarded the Best K-9 Unit, while Lusy with Edinburg CISD Police Department took first in the articles search.

(CBS Television Network; 26.1 uvm) … Arden Farhi

VIDEO: Tom Ridge, the nation's first secretary of Homeland Security, believes the physical border wall President Donald Trump wants to build on the U.S.-Mexico border isn't necessary. "I don't think we need it," Ridge said. "I think there are things we can do with technology that foregoes the need to build a 3,000 mile border [wall] with a neighbor... I prefer presidents that tear down walls rather than build them." Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. Despite his criticism of the President, Ridge, a Republican, praised Mr. Trump's pick to lead the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), Kirstjen Nielsen. "This is a woman that's got public and private sector experience. She's been deputy chief of staff to the president now, she was General [John] Kelly's chief of staff [at DHS], she's well versed and worked with the private sector on preparedness issues and cyber security issues and the like."

(Newsweek; 9.4M uvm) … Nicole Rodriguez

VIDEO: A 20-year-old disabled immigrant detained for more than a month without being charged was to be freed Friday, but he has been stripped of his Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status. After being detained by Customs and Border Protection (CPB) agents on October 11 as part of a human smuggling investigation, Felipe Abonza-Lopez of San Marcos, Texas, was granted a $7,500 bond and will be released sometime Friday, a legal assistant for Abonza-Lopez's attorney told Newsweek Friday. Abonza-Lopez has lost his DACA status, which had been set to expire in 2019. It was revoked October 12, when he received a notice to appear in immigration court for deportation proceedings, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Services (ICE) told Newsweek.

22. Trump Administration Cites MS-13 Arrest to Push Change in Minor Immigrant Law
(Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. “The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration,” Homan said. “Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That’s why that’s one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with.”

The affidavit was filed in a Maryland district court case surrounding the ban. Federal judges in Maryland and Hawaii issued national orders freezing the ban in October. "It is in the interest of the University, as well as in the national interest, to welcome talented persons of all nations to study, teach, and do research in the United States, in order to maintain and improve America's position as a leader in higher education and research," read the statement, signed by Loh Oct. 10.

(Reuters; 43.6M uvm) …David Shepardson and Eric Beech

U.S. President Donald Trump said in a tweet on Friday he is putting a decision to allow imports of elephant trophies on hold after a torrent of criticism from conservation advocates and across social media. Trump’s reversal came hours after his administration released a rule on Friday to allow hunters who kill elephants in Zimbabwe to bring their trophies back to the United States, which had been banned by the Obama administration. “Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!” Trump wrote. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a statement that he had spoken with Trump and “both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical.” He said the “issuing of permits is being put on hold as the decision is being reviewed.”

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

   (KIII-TV; 66k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Michael Gibson

VIDEO: Border patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint said one of their K-9's sniffed out a trunk full of cocaine Wednesday morning. Nearly six million dollars worth of cocaine was discovered during the stop. Kiii News reporter Michael Gibson was at the checkpoint to meet with agents about the incident. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. Investigators believe the drugs were smuggled across an unprotected section of the border and then loaded into the Mercedes.

3. Immigrant Father Says The Border Patrol Took His Infant Son And Won't Tell Him Where He Is
   (BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security) partners to disrupt one of the most dangerous criminal organizations in the United States," Chief Patrol Agent Aaron Heitke, commander of the Grand Forks Sector, said in a statement. VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) …Chris Ramirez

VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. "Pharr does a great job over there, but it's one bridge," said Darling. "There's just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge." Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and southbound, Darling said: "I am shooting for the end of 2018. That is why we want to get the design done and get construction going. We are working on that, state monies, federal monies. They have to get their act together in Washington and set a budget and get some funding (going). We will get it done.

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall's multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. "A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online," Saenz said. "They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. "At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."
CBP's Border Wait Times app also gives hourly updates on lines at each port of entry.

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

   (FedScoop; 57k uvm) … Tajha Chappellet-Lanier

In an era of travel bans and extreme vetting, a Department of Homeland Security inspector general’s report released last week suggests some key border insecurities are a bit more basic — stemming from Customs and Border Protection’s IT weaknesses. “CBP’s IT systems and infrastructure did not fully support its border security objective of preventing the entry of inadmissible aliens to the country,” the report states. “The slow performance of a critical pre-screening system greatly reduced Office of Field Operations officers’ ability to identify any passengers who may represent concerns, including national security threats.” Additionally, the report says, “frequent” system outages mean officers at international airports find themselves relying on backup systems that are weaker when it comes to identifying travelers. “System challenges caused passenger delays and prompted the need to use backup screening methods that did not provide the same level of assurance for vetting passengers prior to entry into the United States,” the report states. … “Users told us that within the legacy environment, system response times and ease of navigation allowed them to complete pre-screening checks fairly effectively,” the report states. “However, the legacy environment was outdated and no longer supportable; therefore, CBP had to undertake efforts to modernize. OFO officers we interviewed stated they experienced poor system performance after switching to the modernized environment.”

U.S. Customs and Border Protection agents reported arresting eight undocumented immigrants from four countries at an Interstate 93 checkpoint in Woodstock last week, the second such operation since August. Detainees hailed from Bulgaria, Guatemala, Ecuador and El Salvador, the agency said. … Along with the undocumented immigrants, border patrol agents reported seizing 71 grams of marijuana, 297 grams of marijuana edibles and 5 ounces of hash oil. The release did not specify whether the drugs were taken from U.S. citizens or undocumented immigrants. … But Chief Patrol Agent John Pfeifer, of the Swanton Sector station in Vermont – which oversees the New Hampshire checkpoint – called it a valuable tool. “Swanton Sector utilizes inspection checkpoints as part of our defense-in-depth strategy” he said in a statement. “U.S. Border Patrol checkpoints are part of an intricate, multi-faceted strategic plan focusing on information, integration and rapid response capabilities, which aid in border security.”

   (FedScoop; 57k uvm) … Tajha Chappellet-Lanier

In an era of travel bans and extreme vetting, a Department of Homeland Security inspector general's report released last week suggests some key border insecurities are a bit more basic — stemming from Customs and Border Protection's IT weaknesses. "CBP's IT systems and infrastructure did not fully support its border security objective of preventing the entry of inadmissible aliens to the country," the report states. "The slow performance of a critical pre-screening system greatly reduced Office of Field Operations officers' ability to identify any passengers who may represent concerns, including national security threats." Additionally, the report says, "frequent" system outages mean officers at international airports find themselves relying on backup systems that are weaker when it comes to identifying travelers. "System challenges caused passenger delays and prompted the need to use backup screening methods that did not provide the same level of assurance for vetting passengers prior to entry into the United States," the report states. … "Users told us that within the legacy environment, system response times and ease of navigation allowed them to complete pre-screening checks fairly effectively," the report states. "However, the legacy environment was outdated and no longer supportable; therefore, CBP had to undertake efforts to modernize. OFO officers we interviewed stated they experienced poor system performance after switching to the modernized environment."

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining

   (WBTS-TV; 20k uvm; Newton, MA) … Richard Lardner

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

2. Major cocaine bust at Sarita checkpoint
   (KIII-TV; 66k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Michael Gibson

VIDEO: Border patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint said one of their K-9's sniffed out a trunk full of cocaine Wednesday morning. Nearly six million dollars worth of cocaine was discovered during the stop. Kiii News reporter Michael Gibson was at the checkpoint to meet with agents about the incident. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. Investigators believe the drugs were smuggled across an unprotected section of the border and then loaded into the Mercedes.

3. Immigrant Father Says The Border Patrol Took His Infant Son And Won't Tell Him Where He Is
   (BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

taped to her body. Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to DEA officials. Officials did not say if the other vehicle occupants were taken into custody.

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security) partners to disrupt one of the most dangerous criminal organizations in the United States," Chief Patrol Agent Aaron Heitke, commander of the Grand Forks Sector, said in a statement. "This arrest is the direct result from of information passed from Immigration and Customs Enforcement and a call from a concerned citizen."

7. Man surrenders at Border Patrol checkpoint following I-25 pursuit
   (Las Cruces Sun-News; 310k uvm; Las Cruces, NM)

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Alexandria Rodriguez

VIDEO: An alert from a Border Patrol K-9 in Kingsville led to the discovery of more than 180 pounds of cocaine at a checkpoint Wednesday. The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9.    (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) …Chris Ramirez

VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

For Farmington native Cassius Clark, the anticipation leading up to Saturday's annual Pro All Stars Series Mega-Meltdown 300 at Hickory Motor Speedway in North Carolina has turned to stress. The team for which Clark drives, King Racing, owned by former racer and Canadian businessman Rollie MacDonald, is stuck at the Canadian border with the car and all of the equipment necessary to run this weekend's race. "They've been delayed at the border cross at Houlton since Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m.," Clark said on the phone from North Carolina. "There was a practice session here yesterday, and there is more on tap for today. It's a 20-hour drive from Houlton to get here, so I sure hope they get released soon." Two other race teams had similar difficulties, Clark said, but were allowed to pass after a lengthy delay. U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

(KGNS-TV; 87k uvm; Laredo, TX) … Phil Whipple

VIDEO:A tour of bridge one and two was given to city officials on both sides of the border as they took a look at the status of the ongoing construction project. According to CBP, construction at both br1idge one and two is coming along fine. Congressman Henry Cuellar, Mayor Pete Saenz, and Nuevo Laredo and Laredo officials toured both facilities with U.S. General Services Administration and Customs and Border Protection. The project is aimed towards increasing efficiency and improving safety and security for vehicle and pedestrian processing. These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

A U.S. man is now in jail after Canada Border Services Agency discovered he had an outstanding felony warrant from Washington State. U.S. Customs and Border Protection issued a news release Friday afternoon title "No shirt, no service, no Canada," saying the Tacoma man arrived northbound at the Peace Arch (Douglas) crossing in South Surrey, shirtless, and told officers he was heading to Toronto to visit friends. (Dickinson Press; 192k uvm; Dickinson, ND) … Grady McGregor

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

(Rio Grande Guardian; 9k uvm; McAllen, TX) … Patricia Martinez

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. "Pharr does a great job over there, but it's one bridge," said Darling. "There's just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge." Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and

(KGBT-TV; 298k uvm; Harlingen, TX) … Jolanie Martinez

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall’s multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. “A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online,” Saenz said. “They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. “At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard,” said Saenz. “I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."
CBP’s Border Wait Times app also gives hourly updates on lines at each port of entry.

Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. (Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. "Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That's why that's one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with."

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

1. Democrats Press Homeland Security Pick on Immigration Issues
   (WBTS-TV; 20k uvm; Newton, MA) … Richard Lardner

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

2. Major cocaine bust at Sarita checkpoint
   (KIII-TV; 66k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Michael Gibson

VIDEO: Border patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint said one of their K-9's sniffed out a trunk full of cocaine Wednesday morning. Nearly six million dollars worth of cocaine was discovered during the stop. Kiii News reporter Michael Gibson was at the checkpoint to meet with agents about the incident. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. Investigators believe the drugs were smuggled across an unprotected section of the border and then loaded into the Mercedes.

3. Immigrant Father Says The Border Patrol Took His Infant Son And Won't Tell Him Where He Is
   (BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

taped to her body. Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to DEA officials. Officials did not say if the other vehicle occupants were taken into custody.

   (Grand Forks Herald; 837k uvm; Grand Forks, ND) … April Baumgarten

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security) partners to disrupt one of the most dangerous criminal organizations in the United States," Chief Patrol Agent Aaron Heitke, commander of the Grand Forks Sector, said in a statement. "This arrest is the direct result from of information passed from Immigration and Customs Enforcement and a call from a concerned citizen."

7. Man surrenders at Border Patrol checkpoint following I-25 pursuit
   (Las Cruces Sun-News; 310k uvm; Las Cruces, NM)

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) … Alexandria Rodriguez

VIDEO: An alert from a Border Patrol K-9 in Kingsville led to the discovery of more than 180 pounds of cocaine at a checkpoint Wednesday. The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. The K-9 alerted an agents to a delivery truck, which led to further inspection, the release states. Agents then found nine packages of methamphetamine, worth more than $260,000, concealed in liquid foam, according to the release.

9. Border Patrol nabs two suspected MS-13 gang members
   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) …Chris Ramirez

VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

For Farmington native Cassius Clark, the anticipation leading up to Saturday's annual Pro All Stars Series Mega-Meltdown 300 at Hickory Motor Speedway in North Carolina has turned to stress. The team for which Clark drives, King Racing, owned by former racer and Canadian businessman Rollie MacDonald, is stuck at the Canadian border with the car and all of the equipment necessary to run this weekend's race. "They've been delayed at the border cross at Houlton since Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m.," Clark said on the phone from North Carolina. "There was a practice session here yesterday, and there is more on tap for today. It's a 20-hour drive from Houlton to get here, so I sure hope they get released soon." Two other race teams had similar difficulties, Clark said, but were allowed to pass after a lengthy delay. U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

(KGNS-TV; 87k uvm; Laredo, TX) … Phil Whipple

VIDEO:A tour of bridge one and two was given to city officials on both sides of the border as they took a look at the status of the ongoing construction project. According to CBP, construction at both br1idge one and two is coming along fine. Congressman Henry Cuellar, Mayor Pete Saenz, and Nuevo Laredo and Laredo officials toured both facilities with U.S. General Services Administration and Customs and Border Protection. The project is aimed towards increasing efficiency and improving safety and security for vehicle and pedestrian processing. These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

(Surrey Now-Leader; 17k uvm; Surrey, BC Canada) … Aaron Hinks

A U.S. man is now in jail after Canada Border Services Agency discovered he had an outstanding felony warrant from Washington State. U.S. Customs and Border Protection issued a news release Friday afternoon title "No shirt, no service, no Canada," saying the Tacoma man arrived northbound at the Peace Arch (Douglas) crossing in South Surrey, shirtless, and told officers he was heading to Toronto to visit friends. The release says that during a search of a rental vehicle, CBSA found small amounts of meth. After being returned to Blaine, officers confirmed the 23-year-old had a felony warrant from the Washington State Department of Corrections for robbery and escape from community custody, which was issued Nov. 13. "The co-operation between three government agencies is priceless," U.S. CBP area port director Kenneth Williams said in the release. "CBSA, CBP and the sheriff's office worked as a team to get this suspected criminal off the street."

Work has already begun, with eight prototypes of new structures recently being showcased in San Diego. (Dickinson Press; 192k uvm; Dickinson, ND) … Grady McGregor

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

(Rio Grande Guardian; 9k uvm; McAllen, TX) … Patricia Martinez

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. "Pharr does a great job over there, but it's one bridge," said Darling. "There's just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge." Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and Nonstop flights from Seattle to Dublin will start next spring. The Seattle Times reports Irish carrier Aer Lingus said Friday the service will begin May 18, 2018. The service will be provided four times a week. Because Dublin airport has its own U.S. Customs and Border Protection facility, passengers and their luggage will be pre-cleared in Ireland before departure, with no need to go through passport control on arrival in Seattle. This will be the first pre-cleared trans-Atlantic flight to fly into Seattle. Aer Lingus also will provide Seattle passengers connections through Dublin to 24 U.K. and European cities.

(KGBT-TV; 298k uvm; Harlingen, TX) … Jolanie Martinez

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall’s multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. “A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online,” Saenz said. “They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. “At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard,” said Saenz. “I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."
CBP’s Border Wait Times app also gives hourly updates on lines at each port of entry.

Federal and local agencies were rivals Friday during the 3rd annual South Texas Police K-9 Competition held at the Rio Grande Valley Livestock Show Grounds in Mercedes. Valley law enforcement agencies and others, along with their K-9s, competed in timed narcotic article and vehicle searches, the obedience and confidence course, and criminal apprehension…If you compete and your dog doesn't do so well, that motivates you," Hidalgo County Sheriff's Office K-9 trainer Javier Solis said… U.S. Border Patrol's K-9, Billy-B, was named top dog in the patrol competition. A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. After being detained by Customs and Border Protection (CPB) agents on October 11 as part of a human smuggling investigation, Felipe Abonza-Lopez of San Marcos, Texas, was granted a $7,500 bond and will be released sometime Friday, a legal assistant for Abonza-Lopez's attorney told Newsweek Friday. (Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. "Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That's why that's one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with."

U.S. President Donald Trump said in a tweet on Friday he is putting a decision to allow imports of elephant trophies on hold after a torrent of criticism from conservation advocates and across social media. Trump's reversal came hours after his administration released a rule on Friday to allow hunters who kill elephants in Zimbabwe to bring their trophies back to the United States, which had been banned by the Obama administration. "Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!" Trump wrote. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a statement that he had spoken with Trump and "both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical." (WOKV-FM; 75.1k uvm; Jacksonville, FL) … Stephanie Brown

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall's multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. "A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online," Saenz said. "They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. "At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."

A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. The U.S. Border Patrol was awarded the Best K-9 Unit, while Lusy with Edinburg CISD Police Department took first in the articles search.

VIDEO: Tom Ridge, the nation's first secretary of Homeland Security, believes the physical border wall President Donald Trump wants to build on the U.S.-Mexico border isn't necessary. "I don't think we need it," Ridge said. "I think there are things we can do with technology that foregoes the need to build a 3,000 mile border [wall] with a neighbor... I prefer presidents that tear down walls rather than build them." Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. Despite his criticism of the President, Ridge, a Republican, praised Mr. Trump's pick to lead the VIDEO: A 20-year-old disabled immigrant detained for more than a month without being charged was to be freed Friday, but he has been stripped of his Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status. After being detained by Customs and Border Protection (CPB) agents on October 11 as part of a human smuggling investigation, Felipe Abonza-Lopez of San Marcos, Texas, was granted a $7,500 bond and will be released sometime Friday, a legal assistant for Abonza-Lopez's attorney told Newsweek Friday. Abonza-Lopez has lost his DACA status, which had been set to expire in 2019. It was revoked October 12, when he received a notice to appear in immigration court for deportation proceedings, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Services (ICE) told Newsweek.

22. Trump Administration Cites MS-13 Arrest to Push Change in Minor Immigrant Law
(Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. "Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That's why that's one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with."

U.S. President Donald Trump said in a tweet on Friday he is putting a decision to allow imports of elephant trophies on hold after a torrent of criticism from conservation advocates and across social media. Trump's reversal came hours after his administration released a rule on Friday to allow hunters who kill elephants in Zimbabwe to bring their trophies back to the United States, which had been banned by the Obama administration. "Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!" Trump wrote. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a statement that he had spoken with Trump and "both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical." He said the "issuing of permits is being put on hold as the decision is being reviewed."

(WOKV-FM; 75.1k uvm; Jacksonville, FL) … Stephanie Brown

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

VIDEO: Border patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint said one of their K-9's sniffed out a trunk full of cocaine Wednesday morning. Nearly six million dollars worth of cocaine was discovered during the stop. Kiii News reporter Michael Gibson was at the checkpoint to meet with agents about the incident. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. Investigators believe the drugs were smuggled across an unprotected section of the border and then loaded into the Mercedes.

3. Immigrant Father Says The Border Patrol Took His Infant Son And Won't Tell Him Where He Is
   (BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security) partners to disrupt one of the most dangerous criminal organizations in the United States," Chief Patrol Agent Aaron Heitke, commander of the Grand Forks Sector, said in a statement.    (Las Cruces Sun-News; 310k uvm; Las Cruces, NM)

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. "Pharr does a great job over there, but it's one bridge," said Darling. "There's just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge." Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and southbound, Darling said: "I am shooting for the end of 2018. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. "A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online," Saenz said. "They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. "At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents." CBP's Border Wait Times app also gives hourly updates on lines at each port of entry.

criminal apprehension…If you compete and your dog doesn't do so well, that motivates you," Hidalgo County Sheriff's Office K-9 trainer Javier Solis said… U.S. Border Patrol's K-9, Billy-B, was named top dog in the patrol competition. A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. The U.S. Border Patrol was awarded the Best K-9 Unit, while Lusy with Edinburg CISD Police Department took first in the articles search.

VIDEO: Tom Ridge, the nation's first secretary of Homeland Security, believes the physical border wall President Donald Trump wants to build on the U.S.-Mexico border isn't necessary. "I don't think we need it," Ridge said. "I think there are things we can do with technology that foregoes the need to build a 3,000 mile border [wall] with a neighbor... I prefer presidents that tear down walls rather than build them." Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. Despite his criticism of the President, Ridge, a Republican, praised Mr. Trump's pick to lead the Department of VIDEO: A 20-year-old disabled immigrant detained for more than a month without being charged was to be freed Friday, but he has been stripped of his Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status. After being detained by Customs and Border Protection (CPB) agents on October 11 as part of a human smuggling investigation, Felipe Abonza-Lopez of San Marcos, Texas, was granted a $7,500 bond and will be released sometime Friday, a legal assistant for Abonza-Lopez's attorney told Newsweek Friday. It was revoked October 12, when he received a notice to appear in immigration court for deportation proceedings, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Services (ICE) told Newsweek.

(Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. "Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That's why that's one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with."

U.S. President Donald Trump said in a tweet on Friday he is putting a decision to allow imports of elephant trophies on hold after a torrent of criticism from conservation advocates and across social media. Trump's reversal came hours after his administration released a rule on Friday to allow hunters who kill elephants in Zimbabwe to bring their trophies back to the United States, which had been banned by the Obama administration. "Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!" Trump wrote. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a statement that he had spoken with Trump and "both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical." He said the "issuing of permits is being put on hold as the decision is being reviewed."

25. 18-year-old accused of shooting CBP agent in Oakleaf said he would "off" cops, according to investigators
(WOKV-FM; 75.1k uvm; Jacksonville, FL) … Stephanie Brown

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

1. Customs took his truck without charging him with a crime. Two years later, he's finally getting it back.
   (Washington Post; 43.9M uvm) … Christopher Ingraham

Customs and Border Protection is returning a Kentucky man's truck, more than two years after it was seized because Border Patrol officers found five bullets in the truck's center console. In September 2015, Customs officers seized the pickup truck belonging to Gerardo Serrano after they found the bullets when he attempted to cross the border into Mexico. The agency maintained that the bullets were "munitions of war" and that transporting them to Mexico was illegal. Serrano says he simply forgot that he left the small ammunition magazine in his truck's center console. Serrano, who holds a concealed carry permit, did not have a gun or any other weapons with him at the time.

   (Gizmodo; 36.7M uvm) … Matt Novak

VIDEO: US Customs and Border Protection recently released video of President Trump's border wall prototypes in San Diego. And we couldn't help but notice something strange from the video. It shows a bird's-eye view of the wall from the perspective of a drone. And the drone is much, much higher than the wall. Do you see what I mean? This is supposed to be a wall that, in President Trump's words, is going to stop "drugs from pouring into this country." But the funny thing about a wall is that you can get over it pretty easily these days—especially as drones become more affordable. CBP's own video proves just how easy it is to get over the damn thing. … When I asked CBP about that, they seemed to acknowledge that the wall obviously doesn't do shit on its own. "Matt, don't forget that there are also agents, sensors, cameras and other technologies monitoring the Border Enforcement Zone," Carlos Diaz, the Southwest Branch Chief for the CBP Office of Public Affairs, told Gizmodo by email. "The combination of those elements allow for the effective and efficient protection of the wall."

3. Over $90k in drugs seized in two separate Border Patrol busts
   (KESQ-TV; 302k uvm; Thousand Palms, CA) … Jon Moreno

The bus was referred to a second inspection and a Border Patrol detection canine team alerted to the top of the luggage compartment. Agents removed all occupants from the bus. The canine alerted to a specific seat. Agents interviewed the owner of the seat and discovered narcotics strapped to a woman's abdomen. The substance of the narcotics tested positive for heroin. The total weight of the heroin was 2.52 pounds and had an estimated street value of $27,720.

    (Washington Examiner; 4.7M uvm) … Gabby Morrongiello

VIDEO: Nine months into his first term, President Trump's proposed wall along the U.S.-Mexico border is finally beginning to take shape. Eight architectural models of what the wall may look like are one week from completion at a construction site just miles away from the southwesternmost point of the United States. Each unique structure has been designed with the challenges border patrol officials currently face in mind, giving way to prototypes with razor wire edges or bottom-heavy cement foundations. When the 30-day construction period ends next week, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials will begin testing each prototype for the unit's ability to prevent climbing, tunnelling, and destruction. The Washington Examiner received an up-close look at each of the eight prototypes, which measure in at around 30 feet in height, along with a tour of the current barriers that exist to prevent illegal border crossings into the United States. Take a look at the exclusive images below:

VIDEO: As crews finish up border wall prototypes, agents continue apprehending undocumented immigrants inside the actual construction zone. Most recently, five Nepali citizens hopped the 7-foot fence Thursday and turned themselves into U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) agents near the construction site. Three men and two women, between ages 19 and 30, requested asylum from their country by claiming credible fear of return. CBP officials said they do not track apprehensions by location, so they couldn't confirm exactly how many similar incidents have occurred near the construction zone. But agents said they have detained others in the same area.

The last two of eight prototypes for President Donald Trump's proposed border wall took shape Thursday at a construction site in San Diego. The prototypes form a tightly packed row of imposing concrete and metal panels, including one with sharp metal edges on top. Another has a surface resembling an expensive brick driveway. Companies have until Oct. 26 to finish the models but Border Patrol spokesman Theron Francisco said the last two came into profile, with crews installing a corrugated metal surface on the eighth model on a dirt lot just a few steps from homes in Tijuana, Mexico. As the crews worked, three men and two women from Nepal, ages 19 to 30, jumped a short rusted fence from Tijuana into the construction site and were immediately stopped by agents on horseback. Francisco said there have been four or five other illegal crossing attempts at the site since work began Sept. 26.

OOIDA Executive Vice President Todd Spencer skips the small talk when talking about Mexican long-haul trucking and the renegotiation of the North American Free Trade Agreement. “It would be nuts to leave this in the agreement, giving Mexico something to use as a hammer to collect tariffs on American goods,” he said Friday. “There is no reason to leave it in the agreement. It doesn’t make economic sense.” Spencer is seldom without harsh words for the Mexican cross-border trucking, its challenges and its history. “The safety regime in Mexico is in no way compatible with trucking regs here and won’t be for a long time,” he says. “The FMCSA pilot program? What a sham.” For years, OOIDA and the Teamsters have said that Mexico’s long-haul fleets trucking in the U.S. was a pie-in-the-sky provision in the NAFTA that was so poorly thought out that there’s no way the U.S. should be held to it. Mexico has disagreed, protesting through the years with retaliatory tariffs.

The border wall remains the focus of the border security debate in Washington. Prototypes are reportedly under construction in San Diego, with the president recently going so far as to declare that he will pick out a wall design himself. Not to be left behind, Republicans in Congress recently proposed a new bill to begin funding a border wall. And this after the House included $1.6 billion for the wall earlier this summer. It would seem that the president's border wall plan is moving apace, though this flurry of activity obscures reality: President Trump's idea will never be built. The only way the wall was going to happen was through an enormous initial effort and investment of resources that quickly made progress such that it could not be easily reversed.

(Niagara Gazette; 196k uvm; Niagara Falls, NY) … Rick Pfeiffer

It's not easy protecting America's borders. I get that. I agree with that. Border Patrol agents working the southern sectors of the United States facing incredibly daunting challenges. And those on the northern border could not be stretched any thinner. Likewise, Customs and Border Protection agents at at our air, sea and land ports of entry face indescribable pressure not to allow really bad people into our country. They have done a truly remarkable job over the years, particularly since 9/11. But now I'm troubled by a new and an aggressive approach to alleged national security matters that isn't just unnecessary, it represents a dangerous encroachment on our civil liberties. While we may wish to argue that American citizens, who leave the country for travel, should not have to check their civil rights at the border before they can return home, the courts have deemed that is constitutionally permissible.

   (Washington Post; 43.9M uvm) … Christopher Ingraham

Customs and Border Protection is returning a Kentucky man's truck, more than two years after it was seized because Border Patrol officers found five bullets in the truck's center console. In September 2015, Customs officers seized the pickup truck belonging to Gerardo Serrano after they found the bullets when he attempted to cross the border into Mexico. The agency maintained that the bullets were "munitions of war" and that transporting them to Mexico was illegal. Serrano says he simply forgot that he left the small ammunition magazine in his truck's center console. Serrano, who holds a concealed carry permit, did not have a gun or any other weapons with him at the time.

This is supposed to be a wall that, in President Trump's words, is going to

CBP’s own video proves just how easy it is to get over the damn thing. … When I asked CBP about that, they seemed to acknowledge that the wall obviously doesn’t do shit on its own. “Matt, don’t forget that there are also agents, sensors, cameras and other technologies monitoring the Border Enforcement Zone,” Carlos Diaz, the Southwest Branch Chief for the CBP Office of Public Affairs, told Gizmodo by email. “The combination of those elements allow for the effective and efficient protection of the wall.”

VIDEO: Nine months into his first term, President Trump's proposed wall along the U.S.-Mexico border is finally beginning to take shape. Eight architectural models of what the wall may look like are one week from completion at a construction site just miles away from the southwesternmost point of the United States. Each unique structure has been designed with the challenges border patrol officials currently face in mind, giving way to prototypes with razor wire edges or bottom-heavy cement foundations. When the 30-day construction period ends next week, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials will begin testing each prototype for the unit's ability to prevent climbing, tunnelling, and destruction. The Washington Examiner received an up-close look at each of the eight prototypes, which measure in at around 30 feet in height, along with a tour of the current barriers that exist to prevent illegal border crossings into the United States. Three men and two women, between ages 19 and 30, requested asylum from their country by claiming credible fear of return. But agents said they have detained others in the same area.

The last two of eight prototypes for President Donald Trump's proposed border wall took shape Thursday at a construction site in San Diego. The prototypes form a tightly packed row of imposing concrete and metal panels, including one with sharp metal edges on top. Another has a surface resembling an expensive brick driveway. Companies have until Oct. 26 to finish the models but Border Patrol spokesman Theron Francisco said the last two came into profile, with crews installing a corrugated metal surface on the eighth model on a dirt lot just a few steps from homes in Tijuana, Mexico. As the crews worked, three men and two women from Nepal, ages 19 to 30, jumped a short rusted fence from Tijuana into the construction site and were immediately stopped by agents on horseback. Francisco said there have been four or five other illegal crossing attempts at the site since work began Sept. 26.

What a sham.” For years, OOIDA and the Teamsters have said that Mexico’s long-haul fleets trucking in the U.S. was a pie-in-the-sky provision in the NAFTA that was so poorly thought out that there’s no way the U.S. should be held to it. - CBP OPA provided the following responses to the NY Times regarding Hurricane Harvey.
  Lead: (b)(6);(b)(7)(C)
  CBP Statement:

  "During those previous hurricanes- which landed in Florida and Louisiana- no checkpoints existed and thus were not in the storm's path inhibiting evacuation. U.S. Border Patrol checkpoints can and do close when safety and efficiency of evacuation is imperative. For Hurricane Harvey, checkpoints located in the Rio Grande Valley are well south of the storm impact zones and evacuation routes. Therefore, those evacuating storm-affected areas do not have to travel through a U.S. Border Patrol Checkpoint. U.S. Customs and Border Protection is not conducting any operations at evacuation centers or shelters. On the contrary, during an evacuation, our highest priority is the safe evacuation of people leaving the impacted areas. As in previous emergency situations, CBP components are focused on search and rescue efforts and stand ready if requested by local law enforcement to assist in larger rescue efforts."

  "For additional clarification the hurricanes referenced hit Louisiana and Florida and U.S. Border Patrol does not have checkpoints there as part of their operational posture. With regard to storms in Texas during Tropical Storm Hermine in 2010 and Hurricane Dolly in 2008, U.S. Border Patrol checkpoints were closed as the storms got closer to facilitate evacuations. Again, I do think it's important to note that U.S. Customs and Border Protection is not conducting any operations at evacuation centers or shelters. On the contrary, during an evacuation, our highest priority is the safe evacuation of people leaving the impacted areas. As in previous emergency situations, CBP components are focused on search and rescue efforts and stand ready if requested by local law enforcement to assist in larger rescue efforts."

When contractors began, earlier this fall, building the prototypes for the wall along the Mexican border that President Trump made central to his campaign, local law enforcement officials braced themselves for chaos. They imagined protests on the scale of those over the Keystone Pipeline, with similar encampments to those in South Dakota last year. Customs and Border Protection was similarly worried that large protests could somehow disrupt the construction of the prototypes. Instead, with the eight prototypes constructed in an industrial section of Otay Mesa near San Diego, there has been little outcry. Large protests have yet to take place and there has been no need to use all the plans each contractor was required to make in case of "a hostile attack." Each of the prototypes cost between $300,000 and $500,000 to

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection opened a new cargo inspection station Monday in Rio Grande City. The new inspection station will reduce congestion by allowing Customs and Border Protection officers and their Mexican counterparts to conduct customs checks together. "We're making international trade more efficient, we're making it where it creates more jobs because we're talking with each other. We're sharing information," said U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo. Cuellar attended the inauguration ceremony Monday at the bridge that connects Rio Grande City and Camargo. "In the end time is money," said Rick Pauza, a spokesman for Customs and Border Protection, who added that the new process is faster and more efficient. "The truck only has to stop one time, but it's inspected by the two countries."

3. 'Stranger Things' At Border Control: Electronic Device Searches Increasingly Common
   (Forbes; 29.8M uvm) … Michelle Fabio

Last week, "Stranger Things" actor and British citizen Charlie Heaton was prohibited from entering the United States after a drug-sniffing dog at Los Angeles International Airport (LAX) alerted officials to Heaton's luggage, where they found traces of cocaine. Approximately 752 individuals are denied entry to the U.S. each day, and although canine cops certainly play a major role with U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP), the digital age has brought a new type of search to which many more of us are likely susceptible: electronic device searches. Also called "digital strip searches" because they can reveal exceedingly private information, searches of laptops and smartphones by CBP more than doubled from 2015 (8,500) to 2016 (19,000). In just the first half of 2017, 15,000 travelers have had their devices searched by CBP. Both U.S. citizens and non-citizens are subject to device searches, which have made for resulting stories some might characterize as "stranger than fiction."

   (KFOX-TV; 92k uvm; El Paso, TX) … Jessica Gonzalez

Arrests have been made in the shooting involving an off-duty Border Patrol agent that closed Interstate 10 last week. The El Paso County Sheriff's Office released the name of the suspects involved. Rafael Roberto Valenzuela and Raul Beltran were arrested and charged with engaging in organized criminal activity and aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. Valenzuela was jailed on a $200,000 bond. Beltran's bond was set at $75,000. An off-duty Border Patrol agent was driving along I-10 last Wednesday when shots were fired at him, according to Border Patrol officials. The agent was not

VIDEO: The cartel uses him as a people smuggler because, as a minor, he'll most likely get a ride back to Mexico if caught by the US border patrol. From there he can make the trip again, and again. … Jose Romero has lived in El Paso - just across from Ciudad Juarez - almost all his life. As a US Border Patrol agent, he has witnessed the developing phenomenon first hand. "We definitely saw the shift in which they [the cartels] started using more juveniles than adults, whereas in the past there were typically more adults," Romero tells Al Jazeera as he stands in the blazing mid-day El Paso sun close to the wire mesh border fence. Romero says the number of juvenile people smugglers they have identified has doubled in the last 10 years. "It used to be a mom and pop operation, and people would pay between $350 and $500 to get smuggled into the US," Romero says. But when the US first erected a fence along the border in 2006, a shift began. With increasingly limited options to cross, Romero says the border patrol noticed small scale people smuggling operations were forced to use the same routes as the drug smuggling cartels. "The cartels noticed that also, and realised their own routes were being compromised," Romero says. "So they took control of the human smuggling routes."

6. Five arrested for attempting to smuggle people across the border
   (KMSB-TV; 596k uvm; Tucson, AZ) … Elizabeth Walton

Over the weekend five U.S. citizens were arrested after attempting to smuggle people across the border. On Friday, Oct. 27 Nogales Border Patrol agents at the Interstate 19 checkpoint south of Amado, referred an 18-year-old Phoenix woman and her Nissan Sentra for secondary inspection. Agents searched the vehicle and discovered a 24-year-old man from Guatemala hiding in the trunk. Several hours later on Friday, agents at the same I-19 checkpoint pulled for secondary inspection, a 39-year-old Tucson woman. When BP agents searched her Mercury Sable, they discovered a 21-year-old man from Guatemala hiding in the trunk. A third incident happened on Saturday, Oct. 28 at an immigration checkpoint on State Route 90 near Benson. BP agents with the Willcox station referred two women from Phoenix for secondary inspection, after a BP canine alerted to an odor it was trained to detect.

Agents and members of the fire department gathered around the stormwater drain on Main Street and Lawton Drive. Agents were able to safely evacuate three of those individuals from the tunnels, but an older male and female might still be in the tunnels.

   (San Angelo LIVE!; 96k uvm; San Angelo, TX) … Brandy Petty

On Oct. 25 U.S. Uvalde Border Patrol Agents performed routine checks on a freight train when they encountered a man hiding inside a gondola-like rock hauler who was injured. He was taken to the Uvalde Memorial Hospital and treated for a broken wrist and a sprained ankle. Without intervention or notice he may have died in the container as his injuries made it impossible for him to escape the container under his own power. The 19-year-old man was determined to be a Honduras national and had entered the United States illegally. Upon release from the hospital, he was processed for illegal entry and faces removal proceedings. “Crossing the border is filled with dangers for those who risk illegal entry into the United States,” said Del Rio Sector Acting Chief Patrol Agent, Matthew J. Hudak. “Our specially trained agents vary their interdiction patrol tactics and stand ready to provide life-saving assistance to any person at a moment’s notice.”

In a story Oct. 29 about an escaped inmate, The Associated Press, based on information provided by the West Virginia Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety, reported erroneously the U.S. agency involved in inmate's apprehension and where he was captured. The agency was the U.S. Customs and Border Protection, not the U.S. Border Patrol. Todd Wayne Boyes was captured in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, not Laredo, Texas. Deven Bargas, 20, of San Jose, was arrested Friday at the U.S.-Mexico border by Customs and Border Protection officers who discovered a murder warrant issued for him when they looked up his identity, police said.     (KVOA-TV; 273k uvm; Tucson, AZ) … Donald Jordan

A 49-year-old Phoenix woman has been arrested for attempting to smuggle nearly 179 pounds of marijuana. It happened at the Port of Lukeville. U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers referred the woman for a secondary inspection. A canine detected an odor in the rear of the vehicle. Officers found 10 packages of marijuana. The woman was arrested for narcotics smuggling and turned over to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Homeland Security Investigations.

BORDER WALL

12. Customs and Border Protection announces completion of border wall prototypes
    (Homeland Preparedness News; 16k uvm) … Kevin Randolph

CBP will now test and evaluate the eight prototypes over a 30 to 60-day period to determine which designs best fit its needs. The designs will be evaluated on characteristics such as anti-breaching capabilities, anti-climbing capabilities, anti-digging capabilities, impedance and denial of traffic, and safety for BP agents. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," Acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello said. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years. Specifically, walls are part of a border enforcement zone, which includes patrol roads, lights and surveillance technology. These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

13. Carper slams Trump's border wall says it "won't solve immigration challenges"
    (WXDE) … Rob Petree

Delaware's senior U.S. Senator Tom Carper slammed President Trump's aspirations to build a wall at the country's southern border. In a statement released in response to President Trump's nominee for Customs and Border Protection Commissioner, Sen. Carper slammed the possibility of a border wall and said it "will not solve our immigration challenges." "The undeniable reality is that the costs associated with building a multi-billion-dollar border wall would inordinately outweigh the benefits. Erecting a wall will not solve our immigration challenges, nor make meaningful progress in stopping the flow of illegal drugs across our border," Sen. Carper said. "Hiring thousands more Border Patrol agents as President Trump has proposed to do, while the existing workforce suffers from poor retention and low morale, is simply not a smart approach, particularly since apprehensions at the border are currently at 40-year lows."

Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs Chrystia Freeland said the U.S. has presented some "troubling" proposals in talks to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement. Ms. Freeland, speaking Monday at the Toronto Global Forum, cited U.S. proposals on Chapter 19 arbitration panels, which allow countries to bypass national courts in tariff disputes, and a sunset clause that would automatically terminate the trade pact if the parties don't renew it every five years. She added that the U.S. and Canada have made progress on less controversial matters, such as eliminating red tape that can hinder Nafta trade.

The Stranger Things 2star missed the second season premiere in Los Angeles last week after being detained at LAX Airport for what a law enforcement source tells ET was possession of small traces of cocaine. "This was a random inspection and we found traces of cocaine within his possession, and that was the reason he was denied entry into the United States," the source says, clarifying that Heaton was not deported and that no charges were filed. The 23-year-old actor headed home on the next available flight to London. "My planned travel to the US last week was affected by an issue at US immigration, and I am working to rectify it as soon as possible," the British actor said in a statement to ET on Monday. " I do want to clarify that I was not arrested or charged with a crime, and cooperated fully with the US officials at LAX." … "Privacy concerns prevent U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) from discussing individual cases of travelers arriving at U.S. ports of entry," a Border Patrol agent told ET in a statement. "Foreign nationals may be inadmissible due to the commission of a crime involving drug possession. A violation, conspiracy to violate or simply an attempt to violate any U.S. State, federal or any foreign government controlled substance violation renders a foreign national inadmissible to the United States ... CBP officers treat all international travelers with integrity, respect and professionalism while keeping the highest standards of security."

U.S. District Judge Diana Saldana ordered Miguel Cabrera-Rangel to eight years in prison. That is the maximum jail time he faced. Federal prosecutors said Cabrera was part of a group trying to enter the country illegally. When agents found the group, Cabrera struggled with the agent. Court documents reveal Cabrera struck the agent and somehow got ahold of the agent's

    (Nogales International; 85 uvm; Nogales, AZ) … Jonathan Clark

Police are being tight-lipped after an officer with U.S. Customs and Border Protection apparently fired a shot through the wall of his Nogales hotel room early Monday, nearly striking the man staying next door, the man said. Officer Oscar Mesta, a spokesman with the Nogales Police Department, initially called the shooting a non-injury “accidental discharge” involving a customs officer. However, he declined to offer additional details or answer follow-up questions, including whether the customs officer had been criminally charged or cited. … A report by the responding officers "will be forwarded to CBP and the Santa Cruz County Attorney's Office for review," he said. "Because this officer may be sanctioned administratively, please contact the CBP public information officer for further information related to the CBP officer involved," he added. A CBP spokeswoman also said the locally based officer “unintentionally discharged” his weapon while off duty, noting that “the incident occurred at a hotel in Nogales, Ariz., and no one was injured.” However, she noted that NPD is the lead investigative agency and “any further questions should be referred to the Nogales Police Department.”

    (KSTP-TV; 856k uvm; Saint Paul, MN) … Joe Augustine and Ryan Raiche

VIDEO: The increased death rate mirrors a rise in the amount of man-made fentanyl being shipped to the United States. In 2015, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers seized just 2 pounds of the drug at mail inspection sites nationwide. That number skyrocketed to 1,100 pounds of the drug confiscated in 2016. Aaron Broussard received "numerous shipments of drugs from international sources," according to court records. The deadly dose of fentanyl that was delivered from Broussard's apartment in Hopkins to Beddow's campus office in St. Paul was likely first shipped through Chicago's O'Hare International Airport -- the customs inspection site nearest the Twin Cities. "(Fentanyl) is our number one priority in the mail branch," said Officer Matthew Davies, of customs and border protection. Earlier this month during a routine shift, Davies' team confiscated a package that contained enough fentanyl to kill hundreds – if not thousands – of people. "I don't think it would be honest for me to say that we are able to catch everything," Davies said.

Both of these cases highlight two developments in the struggle for immigrant rights. First, ICE isn't alone in its agenda to vilify and terrorize the immigrant community. As we see in the Hernandez case and Israel Barrios, the immigrant father detained in Santa Ana who we've been demanding that ICE release, Border Patrol is moving further away from "securing" the border between the U.S and Mexico and into our community, which falls under the 100-mile border zone where the agency is granted extra-constitutional powers.

They agree with Hawaii that the ban is unconstitutional. Hawaii is challenging Trump's proclamation issued last month targeting about 150 million potential travelers from Chad, Iran, Libya, North Korea, Somalia, Syria and Yemen, along with some Venezuelan government officials and their families. VIDEO: The cartel uses him as a people smuggler because, as a minor, he'll most likely get a ride back to Mexico if caught by the US border patrol. From there he can make the trip again, and again. … Jose Romero has lived in El Paso - just across from Ciudad Juarez - almost all his life. As a US Border Patrol agent, he has witnessed the developing phenomenon first hand. "We definitely saw the shift in which they [the cartels] started using more juveniles than adults, whereas in the past there were typically more adults," Romero tells Al Jazeera as he stands in the blazing mid-day El Paso sun close to the wire mesh border fence. Romero says the number of juvenile people smugglers they have identified has doubled in the last 10 years. "It used to be a mom and pop operation, and people would pay between $350 and $500 to get smuggled into the US," Romero says. But when the US first erected a fence along the border in 2006, a shift began. With increasingly limited options to cross, Romero says the border patrol noticed small scale people smuggling operations were forced to use the same routes as the drug smuggling cartels. "The cartels noticed that also, and realised their own routes were being compromised," Romero says. "So they took control of the human smuggling routes."

6. Five arrested for attempting to smuggle people across the border
   (KMSB-TV; 596k uvm; Tucson, AZ) … Elizabeth Walton

Over the weekend five U.S. citizens were arrested after attempting to smuggle people across the border. On Friday, Oct. 27 Nogales Border Patrol agents at the Interstate 19 checkpoint south of Amado, referred an 18-year-old Phoenix woman and her Nissan Sentra for secondary inspection. Agents searched the vehicle and discovered a 24-year-old man from Guatemala hiding in the trunk. Several hours later on Friday, agents at the same I-19 checkpoint pulled for secondary inspection, a 39-year-old Tucson woman. When BP agents searched her Mercury Sable, they discovered a 21-year-old man from Guatemala hiding in the trunk. A third incident happened on Saturday, Oct. 28 at an immigration checkpoint on State Route 90 near Benson. BP agents with the Willcox station referred two women from Phoenix for secondary inspection, after a BP canine alerted to an odor it was trained to detect.

On Oct. 25 U.S. Uvalde Border Patrol Agents performed routine checks on a freight train when they encountered a man hiding inside a gondola-like rock hauler who was injured. He was taken to the Uvalde Memorial Hospital and treated for a broken wrist and a sprained ankle. Without intervention or notice he may have died in the container as his injuries made it impossible for him to escape the container under his own power. The 19-year-old man was determined to be a Honduras national and had entered the United States illegally. Upon release from the hospital, he was processed for illegal entry and faces removal proceedings. “Crossing the border is filled with dangers for those who risk illegal entry into the United States,” said Del Rio Sector Acting Chief Patrol Agent, Matthew J. CBP will now test and evaluate the eight prototypes over a 30 to 60-day period to determine which designs best fit its needs. The designs will be evaluated on characteristics such as anti-breaching capabilities, anti-climbing capabilities, anti-digging capabilities, impedance and denial of traffic, and safety for BP agents. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," Acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello said. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years. Specifically, walls are part of a border enforcement zone, which includes patrol roads, lights and surveillance technology. These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

In a statement released in response to President Trump's nominee for Customs and Border Protection Commissioner, Sen. Carper slammed the possibility of a border wall and said it "will not solve our immigration challenges." "The undeniable reality is that the costs associated with building a multi-billion-dollar border wall would inordinately outweigh the benefits. Erecting a wall will not solve our immigration challenges, nor make meaningful progress in stopping the flow of illegal drugs across our border," Sen. Carper said. "Hiring thousands more Border Patrol agents as President Trump has proposed to do, while the existing workforce suffers from poor retention and low morale, is simply not a smart approach, particularly since apprehensions at the border are currently at 40-year lows."

The Stranger Things 2star missed the second season premiere in Los Angeles last week after being detained at LAX Airport for what a law enforcement source tells ET was possession of small traces of cocaine. "This was a random inspection and we found traces of cocaine within his possession, and that was the reason he was denied entry into the United States," the source says, clarifying that Heaton was not deported and that no charges were filed. The 23-year-old actor headed home on the next available flight to London. "My planned travel to the US last week was affected by an issue at US immigration, and I am working to rectify it as soon as possible," the British actor said in a statement to ET on Monday. " I do want to clarify that I was not arrested or charged with a crime, and cooperated fully with the US officials at LAX." … "Privacy concerns prevent U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) from discussing individual cases of travelers arriving at U.S. ports of entry," a Border Patrol agent told ET in a statement. Police are being tight-lipped after an officer with U.S. Customs and Border Protection apparently fired a shot through the wall of his Nogales hotel room early Monday, nearly striking the man staying next door, the man said. Officer Oscar Mesta, a spokesman with the Nogales Police Department, initially called the shooting a non-injury “accidental discharge” involving a customs officer. However, he declined to offer additional details or answer follow-up questions, including whether the customs officer had been criminally charged or cited. … A report by the responding officers "will be forwarded to CBP and the Santa Cruz County Attorney's Office for review," he said. "Because this officer may be sanctioned administratively, please contact the CBP public information officer for further information related to the CBP officer involved," he added. A CBP spokeswoman also said the locally based officer “unintentionally discharged” his weapon while off duty, noting that “the incident occurred at a hotel in Nogales, Ariz., and no one was injured.” However, she noted that NPD is the lead investigative agency and “any further questions should be referred to the Nogales Police Department.”

VIDEO: The increased death rate mirrors a rise in the amount of man-made fentanyl being shipped to the United States. In 2015, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officers seized just 2 pounds of the drug at mail inspection sites nationwide. That number skyrocketed to 1,100 pounds of the drug confiscated in 2016. Aaron Broussard received "numerous shipments of drugs from international sources," according to court records. The deadly dose of fentanyl that was delivered from Broussard's apartment in Hopkins to Beddow's campus office in St. Paul was likely first shipped through Chicago's O'Hare International Airport -- the customs inspection site nearest the Twin Cities. "(Fentanyl) is our number one priority in the mail branch," said Officer Matthew Davies, of customs and border protection. Earlier this month during a routine shift, Davies' team confiscated a package that contained enough fentanyl to kill hundreds – if not thousands – of people. "I don't think it would be honest for me to say that we are able to catch everything," Davies said.

Both of these cases highlight two developments in the struggle for immigrant rights. First, ICE isn't alone in its agenda to vilify and terrorize the immigrant community. As we see in the Hernandez case and Israel Barrios, the immigrant father detained in Santa Ana who we've been demanding that ICE release, Border Patrol is moving further away from "securing" the border between the U.S and Mexico and into our community, which falls under the 100-mile border zone where the agency is granted extra-constitutional powers.

- The Washington Post reported a Senate panel will vote on Kirstjen Nielsen's nomination for DHS Secretary Tuesday. If approved by the Senate panel, the next step in the process would be a full Senate confirmation vote in the following weeks. The confirmation process has also been reported on by top tier media outlet Breitbart, and the Washington Post article was shared by smaller media outlets Laredo Morning Times and Aviation News.
- The Laredo Morning Times reported that CBP officers seized over 400 pounds of cocaine at the World Trade Bridge. "This seizure demonstrates a great example of teamwork from our CBP officers," Laredo Port Director Albert Flores said. "I commend our officers for their hard work, dedication and commitment to the CBP mission." The bust was not widely reported in the period.
- Fox News reported Border Patrol agents on the Confined Space Entry Team (CSET) were called to El Paso twice in one week to search the storm drains for illegal immigrants. While dangerous, it is not uncommon to find illegal immigrants who have been left in storm drains by smugglers. According to Supervisory Border Patrol Agent Nick Veliz the smugglers do not care about the dangers because "To them they're just money. So they just let them in and if they get out, good, if not, it doesn't really make a difference to them." This storyline was not widely reported in the period.

A Senate panel is scheduled to vote Tuesday on the nomination of President Trump's pick to lead the Department of Homeland Security, Kirstjen Nielsen, despite a push from Democrats to hold additional hearings. Five Democrats on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee wrote a letter last week to the panel's chairman, Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), urging him to bring Nielsen back for more questioning. They cited a report in The Washington Post describing efforts by top White House officials to pressure the acting DHS secretary, Elaine Duke, over an immigration decision. The report also detailed Duke's plans to resign. Johnson has not formally responded to the Democrats' letter, but his decision to schedule a vote for Tuesday morning indicates the panel's Republican majority wants to proceed with her nomination. If Nielsen is approved Tuesday, it would set the stage for a full Senate confirmation vote in the coming weeks.

Over 400 pounds of cocaine were found in a commercial shipment of paper towels and rolls at the World Trade Bridge in Laredo, the U.S. Customs and Border Protection said late last week. The seizure occurred Monday when a CBP officer referred a tractor trailer hauling a commercial shipment of paper towels and rolls for inspection. CBP officers discovered 159 packages allegedly containing 424 pounds of alleged cocaine hidden within the shipment. The cocaine has an estimated street value of $3,270,800. CBP officers then seized the drugs before turning the case over to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement-Homeland Security Investigations special agents for further investigation. "This seizure demonstrates a great example of teamwork from our CBP officers," Laredo Port Director Albert Flores said. "I commend our officers for their hard work, dedication and commitment to the CBP mission."

VIDEO: Twice in one week, U.S. Border Patrol agents on the Confined Space Entry Team, or CSET, were called to search storm drains in El Paso, Texas, for illegal immigrants trying to get away right under their feet. Smugglers, unconcerned about the safety of those crossing into the U.S., put immigrants into the drains as a way to avoid detection and escape arrest. "To them they're just money. So they just let them in and if they get out, good, if not, it doesn't really make a difference to them," said Supervisory Border Patrol Agent Nick Veliz. "We've had people go in and actually come all the way back out because they got lost and didn't know what to do." Border Patrol's CSET team was called twice recently to search drains near the U.S.–Mexico border, close to downtown El Paso. On Monday, October 30, agents rescued a woman who broke her ankle in the drain. The agent who made the rescue put the immigrant on his back and carried her out of the drain. The hours-long search and rescue was a joint operation between the Border Patrol and El Paso Fire Department.

5. Mexico’s southern border and the immigration consequences
   (Global Risk Insights) … Samuel Schofield

For decades the US experienced high volumes of illegal immigration from Mexico, largely due to economic hardship in Mexico and inadequate and inconsistent enforcement by the US. However, in recent years the net immigration from Mexico to the US has all but disappeared, and more Mexicans are in fact migrating within Mexico. This trend began well before President Trump came to office. Some of the changes stem from an improving economy and job market in Mexico, as well as improved border enforcement by both Mexico and the US. In the past year, undoubtedly, some have also been deterred by Trump’s threats of increased deportations. The largest source of illegal immigration at the US southern border now comes from Central American immigrants, specifically from the Golden Triangle, or Guatemala, Honduras and El Salvador. These countries have not witnessed the same degree of economic growth as Mexico and high levels of corruption, poverty, and exposure to drug-related violence induce many to leave. When it comes to drugs, Mexican drug cartels remain the largest foreign suppliers of heroin, and methamphetamines to the US, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). Mexican cartels have also become leading producers of Fentanyl, a powerful synthetic. Cocaine largely originates from Bolivia, Colombia, and Peru, but the DEA estimates that 93-94% of Colombian cocaine comes to the US via the Mexico/Central America land corridor. Recognizing the threats posed from Central America, in recent years, the US and Mexico have enacted joint efforts to strengthen enforcement of both the US and Mexico southern borders… The U.S. Department of State's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL) has implemented programs with the CBP and ICE to strengthen law enforcement institutions and train Mexican police and military units to improve drug seizures in the southern border zone.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A simple traffic stop along Interstate 85 in a neighboring county Thursday evening turned into a massive drug bust and pulled more than a million dollars in high grade marijuana off the streets before it could ever make it. According to a press release from the Troup County Sheriff's Office, a tractor trailer was stopped around 8:45 p.m. Thursday night along Interstate 85 after a deputy observed the truck bypass a weight station near mile marker 23. When the deputy initiated the stop on the truck a search was performed on the vehicle. The search by law enforcement yielded more than 150 pounds of high-grade marijuana. According to the Troup County Sheriff's Department the marijuana has a street value of $1.6 million dollars. Police took the driver Amaury Izquierdo Mansito, 38, and a passenger Marco Alfaro, 50-years-old into custody. Both men were charged with trafficking marijuana. In addition, Mansito was also charged with failure to maintain lane, failure to obey a traffic control device, and driving with an expired license. Border Patrol arrested a Peñitas man last week after an agent caught him attempting to pick up immigrants near Los Ebanos, according to the federal criminal complaint against him. Jose Heriberto Zuniga, 21, of Peñitas drove a black Chevrolet Cobalt through Los Ebanos on Nov. 7 "looking side to side as if he was searching for someone," according to the criminal complaint. Zuniga's behavior caught the attention of a Border Patrol agent. "The agent drove towards Zuniga's location, and Zuniga began to drive away," according to the criminal complaint. "As Zuniga began to drive away, three subjects were observed jumping a chain link fence from an abandoned property. The Cobalt then came to a stop and the three subjects boarded the Cobalt." The passengers, though, didn't stay long. When the car stopped, they jumped out and started running away.
Zuniga kept driving north. Border Patrol agents stopped him near the intersection of Paloma Street and U.S. 83 in Sullivan City. Agents also tracked down and detained all three passengers, who weren't legally present in the United States. Zuniga is charged with bringing in and harboring aliens.

VIDEO: Although approval for a new border wall has yet to come, the Trump administration has taken subtle steps to be able to seize land to build one, including by restarting litigation that has laid dormant for years against landowners, according to a new report from Senate Democrats. Roughly two-thirds of the US-Mexico border runs through private or state-owned lands, meaning the federal government would need to purchase, seize or seek permission to use land in order to build a border wall. Based on efforts a decade ago to build border fencing, that process is likely to cost the government millions and could take years of complex litigation. And it appears the administration is gearing up for it. In July, CBP issued a notice related to a project to shore up existing fencing the Rio Grande Valley, which also foreshadowed more to come. "Using existing funds for preparatory activities, CBP and (US Army Corps of Engineers) will soon begin public-facing real estate research activities for (Rio Grande Valley) border wall requirements in the President's FY 2018 budget," the notice said, citing in-person research on property records at courthouses. Asked about the notice, Carlos Diaz, a spokesman for CBP, said the research included soil-sampling activities and pointed CNN to congressional testimony from CBP leadership that spoke generally about prioritizing efforts on the Southwest border, including to "leverage expertise in federal acquisition."

VIDEO: Donald Trump's administration has failed to give a clear indication as to how much the land acquisition for the long-promised U.S. Mexico border wall will actually cost, a report claims. According to a report released on Monday by Democratic staff of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, the administration has not provided the committee with any "definitive real estate costs or requirements."
In addition, the report claims Trump's administration has not outlined how many U.S. citizen landowners will be affected by construction of the barrier, nor a timeline or costs for land seizure. "Despite the Administration's request for an initial down payment of $1.6 billion to pay for 74 miles of wall construction and replacement fencing in Fiscal Year (FY) 2018, the Administration cannot provide the Committee with any definitive real estate costs or requirements, cannot tell the Committee how many American citizens will have their land seized, and has no timeline for completing land acquisition efforts necessary to build the wall that President Trump has ordered," a release on the report stated. "During a briefing to Committee staff, a CBP official said that land acquisition posed an ongoing challenge and that title research may 'never be finalized,'" it added.

Protests over the border wall prototypes that recently went up in otay mesa never materialized, but that doesn't mean everyone in the region is fine with the exercise. Throughout the county, artwork is expressing anger and defiance over the wall. An artist from UCSD made a short film spoofing the border wall, reports CityBeat. The artist, Andrew Sturm, created a parody in which an international news outlet sends a reporter to interview an entrepreneur on his new business venture: manufacturing ladders with ropes attached. The ladders, the entrepreneur says, are for Americans fleeing south. An interactive art installation at Liberty Station Oct. 30 and 31 gave San Diegans the opportunity to show their solidarity with Dreamers, those who were brought to the U.S. illegally when they were children, in the face of the Trump administration's decision to rescind the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program in September, reports the Union-Tribune. The San Diego Art Institute also has a border-themed exhibition: Mano a Mano. Starting at the opposite ends of a 16-foot wall, two artists – Hugo Crosthwaite and Jose Hugo Sanchez – mimicked boxing matches over five days by performing several rounds of "battle" as they painted their way to the middle of the mural – a discourse on migration and the U.S.-Mexico border region.

(BiometricUpdate; 150k uvm) … Chris Burt

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) has issued a "call to action" over a proposal by the U.S. Transportation Safety Authority (TSA) to collect facial images and iris scans under the PreCheck application program, which the EFF says paves the way for "a massive violation of privacy" by the Department of Homeland Security. The latest proposal… looks to expand the biometrics collected under it to include facial images and iris scans. "The regular collection of biometrics, such as facial images, will provide TSA with the ability to use those biometrics for identity verification at TSA checkpoints, potentially eliminating the need to show identity documents and improving both security and the customer experience," the proposal states. The EFF points out that facial recognition technology has used in pilot projects by CBP at airports and land borders over the past two years, and that CBP stated in Privacy Impact Assessments that U.S. citizens data would be deleted. That practice has changed, EFF says, with CBP expanding the biometric screening process to include U.S. citizens without authorization from congress, and the latest proposal includes retaining their facial images for two weeks, and their travel information for 15 years. The EFF alleges that the programs, taken together, constitute an effort by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to expand its biometric data collection and use far beyond the 5 million Americans registered for pre-check through its sub-agencies.

(Politico; 24M uvm) … Amanda Ripley

Despite expanding rapidly over the past two decades, federal law enforcement agencies remain almost as male-dominated as they were during the Clinton administration, according to a new POLITICO survey — the first to assess the gender gap in federal law enforcement in nearly a decade. In 1996, women held about 14 percent of the country's federal law enforcement jobs; today, women represent just 15 percent. At this rate, it will be 700 years before women hold half of these jobs… The lowest ratio of all belongs to the Border Patrol. Just 5 percent of its agents are female…Somewhat surprisingly, given the agency's paltry percentage of female agents, the Border Patrol's newest acting chief is a woman — for the first time in the agency's 93-year history. Carla Provost is a veteran agent who commands respect up and down the ranks, and has vowed to do better. "There's more we can do to recruit women," she told POLITICO in an interview in her office in Washington this fall. "The more women, the more African-Americans, the more different groups — it just makes us better." Agents who don't fit the stereotype can defuse tense situations, she says. "There's a different approach when a female agent comes onto the scene," Provost says. "I experienced this myself. In stressful situations, sometimes it's a calming effect." But the agency's history suggests change will be difficult. When Provost started as a new agent 22 years ago, the Border Patrol had 5 percent women—the same ratio it has today.

(Homeland Preparedness News; 16k uvm) … Dave Kovaleski

The Government Accountability Office (GAO) released a report last week examining the deployment strategy of U.S. Border Patrol agents and activities at immigration checkpoints in the Southwest region of the United States. U.S. Border Patrol deploys agents along the southwest border in areas both close to the border and in locations up to 100 miles from the border. This is part of a layered or "defense in depth strategy" the agency deploys. In addition, immigration checkpoints are typically located between 25 and 100 miles from the border. GAO was asked to review these strategies, particularly the defense in depth approach. The GAO found that agent deployment decisions are based on a variety of factors, including staffing levels and the availability of agents. Currently, Border Patrol has about 1,900 fewer agents than authorized, which presents a major challenge for agent deployment. The problem is, attrition has exceeded hiring in recent years. Further, due to these challenges, GAO found that agents were available for deployment about 43 percent of the time.

17. Our View: Arizona. Ports. Need. More. Staffing. Must we shout it?
(Arizona Republic; 10.8M uvm; Phoenix, AZ)

VIDEO: Arizona isn't to blame for the circumstances that led a family-owned store to close after six decades. But Arizona has an economic interest in shifting the national rhetoric to keep more stores from closing. Our state should lead a national discussion about the value of well staffed ports of entry. Consider that Bracker's Department Store in Nogales thrived in its current location a block north of the U.S.-Mexico border since 1954. Like many businesses there, it relied on a steady stream of shoppers from Mexico, who cross legally at the port of entry, buy things and go home. But recent U.S. policies led to longer wait times and fewer shoppers from across the border.

This matters to the entire state. A 2008 study done by the University of Arizona's Eller College of Management for the Arizona Office of Tourism found Mexican shoppers spent $2.69 billion a year in Arizona. Shopping malls in Phoenix and Tucson were destinations, so the cash got spread north of the borderlands. This study remains an eye-opener for those who see the border solely as something to fear. Current information would help our state's leadership and congressional delegation make the economic case for maintaining well staffed, modern ports of entry. That is an important argument to articulate as the nation ponders spending limited resources on walls and more Border Patrol agents. The agency was short 3,811 officers in 2013, when Congress approved hiring 2,000 more CBP officers. As of August, there were still 1,400 vacancies.

(New York Times; 29.9M uvm) … Miriam Jordan

A federal appeals court in California on Monday allowed President Trump's latest travel restrictions to partly take effect, ruling that the government can bar entry to people who come from six majority-Muslim countries and who lack ties to the United States, thus handing the administration a momentary victory. In a two-paragraph order, a panel of three judges from the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco ruled on the administration's request to block a lower court's decision, from a federal judge in Hawaii, that prevented the latest travel policy from being implemented.

The appeals panel on Monday upheld that ruling for people with a "bona fide relationship" with close family or an entity in the United States, like a university or company. But the court blocked the lower court's decision for people from the six countries without such ties, meaning they can now be kept from entering the United States. The restrictions will apply to travelers from Chad, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Syria and Yemen. The latest ban also blocks travel by certain Venezuelan government officials and most North Koreans; courts have not stopped the administration from enacting the restrictions on those countries.

A 20-year-old undocumented immigrant with Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status has been in ICE detention for a month, despite President Donald Trump's promises not to go after young people with DACA protections, an advocate for the young man said on Monday. Felipe Abonza-Lopez and his advocates say he was picked up in spite of a clean criminal record when he was riding in a car with undocumented family members. CBP confirmed arresting a DACA recipient, and said it was "in the course of a human smuggling investigation." The recipient's "status will be reviewed at an immigration hearing," Border Patrol Chief Patrol Agent Felix Chavez said in a statement. Amy Fischer, the policy director of RAICES, which is assisting with Abonza-Lopez's case, said he was not smuggling and has not been charged with anything. "If CBP is trying to criminalize DACA recipients with mixed status families for driving in a car with their undocumented family members, that is wholly unjust," she said in an email. "We know that ICE will try to detain and deport people who have DACA so long as no one is paying attention to it," Fischer said. CBP said in a statement that the Uvalde County Sheriff's Office asked Border Patrol for assistance after a citizen reported a suspicious vehicle on Oct. 12. The people in the car were then picked up by Border Patrol and later transferred to Immigration and Customs Enforcement.
Agents determined that two people in the car had been previously deported and reinstated their orders of removal. They charged an additional person with illegal entry. The other two individuals included a DACA recipient — presumably, Abonza-Lopez.

The Obama administration ended the so-called "wet foot, dry foot" policy in January 2017. This part of the Cuban Adjustment Act allowed Cubans without visas to stay in the United States and begin the citizenship process once their feet touched dry land. The looming possibility of the end of "wet foot, dry foot" created a renewed surge of Cubans trying to enter the U.S. in 2016. This meant that many Cubans were on their way to America, either in border towns in Mexico or stranded in countries like Colombia and Brazil, when former President Obama ended the policy. Changing the Cuban Adjustment Act was meant to reflect the normalizing relationship between the U.S. and Cuba after decades of tension and sanctions against the communist Caribbean country. But instead of fostering peace and a safer immigration experience, ending the policy may have generated mass confusion in the Cuban immigrant communities and created a steady new human revenue stream for privately owned detention centers to legally exploit. Combine this with President Trump's plan to increase the number of immigrants detained on any given day from 40,000 to 80,000 people, and the private prison corporations in America stand to double their daily revenue to around $12 million. For Geo Group and CoreCivic, two corporations that own nearly all of the private detention centers in the United States, taking advantage of the political plight of Cubans fleeing their country might just seem like good business sense.

Nielsen's most controversial statements on immigration have revolved around her open support for amnesty for Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) illegal aliens...Nielsen's testimony and answers during her hearing did not make any declaration of support — or even any reference to — Trump's detailed 70-point list of immigration principles which were announced on October 8…In the face of Democratic hostility, Nielsen actually downplayed the importance of the wall. Trump's immigration agenda has emphasized putting the U.S. economy and needs of Americans first. But when answering a question about how to deter illegal immigration, Nielsen said she wanted to improve the economies of foreign nations which send their illegal aliens to the United States, even as she declined to talk about more direct countermeasures, such as the construction of a border wall and the enforcement of sanctions against employers who hire illegals. "We have to increase the prosperity there," Nielsen said of foreign countries.

VIDEO: Twice in one week, U.S. Border Patrol agents on the Confined Space Entry Team, or CSET, were called to search storm drains in El Paso, Texas, for illegal immigrants trying to get away right under their feet. Smugglers, unconcerned about the safety of those crossing into the U.S., put immigrants into the drains as a way to avoid detection and escape arrest. “To them they’re just money. So they just let them in and if they get out, good, if not, it doesn’t really make a difference to them,” said Supervisory Border Patrol Agent Nick Veliz. “We’ve had people go in and actually come all the way back out because they got lost and didn’t know what to do.” Border Patrol’s CSET team was called twice recently to search drains near the U.S.–Mexico border, close to downtown El Paso. On Monday, October 30, agents rescued a woman who broke her ankle in the drain. The agent who made the rescue put the immigrant on his back and carried her out of the drain. The hours-long search and rescue was a joint operation between the Border Patrol and El Paso Fire Department. “It’s good to work jointly with people,” said Agent Eric Lerch who took part in the rescue. “I always practice for the worst-case scenario.” On Wednesday November 2, CSET searched drains in west El Paso after an agent caught four immigrants climbing out. The agents went in to make sure no immigrants were left behind — they didn’t find anyone.

5. Mexico's southern border and the immigration consequences
(Global Risk Insights) … Samuel Schofield

For decades the US experienced high volumes of illegal immigration from Mexico, largely due to economic hardship in Mexico and inadequate and inconsistent enforcement by the US. However, in recent years the net immigration from Mexico to the US has all but disappeared, and more Mexicans are in fact migrating within Mexico. This trend began well before President Trump came to office. Some of the changes stem from an improving economy and job market in Mexico, as well as improved border enforcement by both Mexico and the US. In the past year, undoubtedly, some have also been deterred by Trump's threats of increased deportations. The largest source of illegal immigration at the US southern border now comes from Central American immigrants, specifically from the Golden Triangle, or Guatemala, Honduras and El Salvador. These countries have not witnessed the same degree of economic growth as Mexico and high levels of corruption, poverty, and exposure to drug-related violence induce many to leave. When it comes to drugs, Mexican drug cartels remain the largest foreign suppliers of heroin, and methamphetamines to the US, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). Mexican cartels have also become leading producers of Fentanyl, a powerful synthetic. Cocaine largely originates from Bolivia, Colombia, and Peru, but the DEA estimates that 93-94% of Colombian cocaine comes to the US via the Mexico/Central America land corridor. Recognizing the threats posed from Central America, in recent years, the US and Mexico have enacted joint efforts to strengthen enforcement of both the US and Mexico southern borders… The U.S. Department of State's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement (INL) has implemented programs with the CBP and ICE to strengthen law enforcement institutions and train Mexican police and military units to improve drug seizures in the southern border zone.

A simple traffic stop along Interstate 85 in a neighboring county Thursday evening turned into a massive drug bust and pulled more than a million dollars in high grade marijuana off the streets before it could ever make it. According to a press release from the Troup County Sheriff's Office, a tractor trailer was stopped around 8:45 p.m. Thursday night along Interstate 85 after a deputy observed the truck bypass a weight station near mile marker 23. When the deputy initiated the stop on the truck a search was performed on the vehicle. The search by law enforcement yielded more than 150 pounds of high-grade marijuana. According to the Troup County Sheriff's Department the marijuana has a street value of $1.6 million dollars. Police took the driver Amaury Izquierdo Mansito, 38, and a passenger Marco Alfaro, 50-years-old into custody. Both men were charged with trafficking marijuana. In addition, Mansito was also charged with failure to maintain lane, failure to obey a traffic control device, and driving with an expired license. Troup County authorities reached out to several other agencies about the drug bust to include CBP, and Homeland Security for assistance in the large drug bust.

VIDEO: Although approval for a new border wall has yet to come, the Trump administration has taken subtle steps to be able to seize land to build one, including by restarting litigation that has laid dormant for years against landowners, according to a new report from Senate Democrats. Roughly two-thirds of the US-Mexico border runs through private or state-owned lands, meaning the federal government would need to purchase, seize or seek permission to use land in order to build a border wall. Based on efforts a decade ago to build border fencing, that process is likely to cost the government millions and could take years of complex litigation. And it appears the administration is gearing up for it. In July, CBP issued a notice related to a project to shore up existing fencing the Rio Grande Valley, which also foreshadowed more to come. "Using existing funds for preparatory activities, CBP and (US Army Corps of Engineers) will soon begin public-facing real estate research activities for (Rio Grande Valley) border wall requirements in the President's FY 2018 budget," the notice said, citing in-person research on property records at courthouses. Asked about the notice, Carlos Diaz, a spokesman for CBP, said the research included soil-sampling activities and pointed CNN to congressional testimony from CBP leadership that spoke generally about prioritizing efforts on the Southwest border, including to "leverage expertise in federal acquisition."

    (Newsweek; 9.4M uvm) … Harriet Sinclair

VIDEO: Donald Trump's administration has failed to give a clear indication as to how much the land acquisition for the long-promised U.S. Mexico border wall will actually cost, a report claims. According to a report released on Monday by Democratic staff of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, the administration has not provided the committee with any "definitive real estate costs or requirements." In addition, the report claims Trump's administration has not outlined how many U.S. citizen landowners will be affected by construction of the barrier, nor a timeline or costs for land seizure. "Despite the Administration's request for an initial down payment of $1.6 billion to pay for 74 miles of wall construction and replacement fencing in Fiscal Year (FY) 2018, the Administration cannot provide the Committee with any definitive real estate costs or requirements, cannot tell the Committee how many American citizens will have their land seized, and has no timeline for completing land acquisition efforts necessary to build the wall that President Trump has ordered," a release on the report stated. “During a briefing to Committee staff, a CBP official said that land acquisition posed an ongoing challenge and that title research may ‘never be finalized,’” it added.

(Voice of San Diego; 146k uvm; San Diego, CA) … Maya Srikrishnan

Protests over the border wall prototypes that recently went up in otay mesa never materialized, but that doesn’t mean everyone in the region is fine with the exercise. Throughout the county, artwork is expressing anger and defiance over the wall. An artist from UCSD made a short film spoofing the border wall, reports CityBeat. The artist, Andrew Sturm, created a parody in which an international news outlet sends a reporter to interview an entrepreneur on his new business venture: manufacturing ladders with ropes attached. The ladders, the entrepreneur says, are for Americans fleeing south. An interactive art installation at Liberty Station Oct. 30 and 31 gave San Diegans the opportunity to show their solidarity with Dreamers, those who were brought to the U.S. illegally when they were children, in the face of the Trump administration’s decision to rescind the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program in September, reports the Union-Tribune. The San Diego Art Institute also has a border-themed exhibition: Mano a Mano. Starting at the opposite ends of a 16-foot wall, two artists – Hugo Crosthwaite and Jose Hugo Sanchez – mimicked boxing matches over five days by performing several rounds of “battle” as they painted their way to the middle of the mural – a discourse on migration and the U.S.-Mexico border region.

VIDEO: The jeans Estela Ortiz wears to work on casual Fridays are a last vestige of the job she held for 24 years at Levi Strauss, one of El Paso’s top employers before the North American Free Trade Agreement clobbered the town’s textile industry. The 1994 trade pact helped eliminate the jobs of Ortiz and thousands of others in the West Texas border town, as manufacturing plants in the area left for Mexico and elsewhere, and firms boosted imports. But Ortiz, like many others in El Paso, has come to terms with the changes. Now, as the administration of President Donald Trump, a Republican, works to renegotiate or scrap the trade deal, what worries many is what kind of economic havoc eliminating NAFTA could bring.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) has issued a “call to action” over a proposal by the U.S. Transportation Safety Authority (TSA) to collect facial images and iris scans under the PreCheck application program, which the EFF says paves the way for “a massive violation of privacy" by the Department of Homeland Security. The latest proposal… looks to expand the biometrics collected under it to include facial images and iris scans. "The regular collection of biometrics, such as facial images, will provide TSA with the ability to use those biometrics for identity verification at TSA checkpoints, potentially eliminating the need to show identity documents and improving both security and the customer experience," the proposal states. The EFF points out that facial recognition technology has used in pilot projects by CBP at airports and land borders over the past two years, and that CBP stated in Privacy Impact Assessments that U.S. citizens data would be deleted. That practice has changed, EFF says, with CBP expanding the biometric screening process to include U.S. citizens without authorization from congress, and the latest proposal includes retaining their facial images for two weeks, and their travel information for 15 years. The EFF alleges that the programs, taken together, constitute an effort by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to expand its biometric data collection and use far beyond the 5 million Americans registered for pre-check through its sub-agencies.

As Border Patrol Chief Carla Provost tells it, there is "no difference between female agents, male agents — we're all Border Patrol agents." Provost, the agency's first female head, sat down with Women Rule to discuss her history-making career, the Border Patrol's vast gender gap, and why it matters to have more women in their ranks. Journalist Amanda Ripley interviewed Provost at her Washington, D.C., office this fall.

15. Federal law enforcement has a woman problem
(Politico; 24M uvm) … Amanda Ripley

Despite expanding rapidly over the past two decades, federal law enforcement agencies remain almost as male-dominated as they were during the Clinton administration, according to a new POLITICO survey — the first to assess the gender gap in federal law enforcement in nearly a decade. In 1996, women held about 14 percent of the country's federal law enforcement jobs; today, women represent just 15 percent. At this rate, it will be 700 years before women hold half of these jobs… The lowest ratio of all belongs to the Border Patrol. Just 5 percent of its agents are female…Somewhat surprisingly, given the agency's paltry percentage of female agents, the Border Patrol's newest acting chief is a woman — for the first time in the agency's 93-year history. Carla Provost is a veteran agent who commands respect up and down the ranks, and has vowed to do better. "There's more we can do to recruit women," she told POLITICO in an interview in her office in Washington this fall. "The more women, the more African-Americans, the more different groups — it just makes us better." Agents who don't fit the stereotype can defuse tense situations, she says. "There's a different approach when a female agent comes onto the scene," Provost says. "I experienced this myself. In stressful situations, sometimes it's a calming effect." But the agency's history suggests change will be difficult. When Provost started as a new agent 22 years ago, the Border Patrol had 5 percent women—the same ratio it has today.

16. GAO looks at Border Patrol deployment of agents in Southwest
(Homeland Preparedness News; 16k uvm) … Dave Kovaleski

The Government Accountability Office (GAO) released a report last week examining the deployment strategy of U.S. Border Patrol agents and activities at immigration checkpoints in the Southwest region of the United States. U.S. Border Patrol deploys agents along the southwest border in areas both close to the border and in locations up to 100 miles from the border. This is part of a layered or "defense in depth strategy" the agency deploys. In addition, immigration checkpoints are typically located between 25 and 100 miles from the border. GAO was asked to review these strategies, particularly the defense in depth approach. The GAO found that agent deployment decisions are based on a variety of factors, including staffing levels and the availability of agents. Currently, Border Patrol has about 1,900 fewer agents than authorized, which presents a major challenge for agent deployment. The problem is, attrition has exceeded hiring in recent years. Further, due to these challenges, GAO found that agents were available for deployment about 43 percent of the time.

17. Our View: Arizona. Ports. Need. More. Staffing. Must we shout it?
(Arizona Republic; 10.8M uvm; Phoenix, AZ)

VIDEO: Arizona isn't to blame for the circumstances that led a family-owned store to close after six decades. But Arizona has an economic interest in shifting the national rhetoric to keep more stores from closing. Our state should lead a national discussion about the value of well staffed ports of entry. Consider that Bracker's Department Store in Nogales thrived in its current location a block north of the U.S.-Mexico border since 1954. Like many businesses there, it relied on a steady stream of shoppers from Mexico, who cross legally at the port of entry, buy things and go home. But recent U.S. policies led to longer wait times and fewer shoppers from across the border.
This matters to the entire state. A 2008 study done by the University of Arizona's Eller College of Management for the Arizona Office of Tourism found Mexican shoppers spent $2.69 billion a year in Arizona. Shopping malls in Phoenix and Tucson were destinations, so the cash got spread north of the borderlands. This study remains an eye-opener for those who see the border solely as something to fear. Current information would help our state's leadership and congressional delegation make the economic case for maintaining well staffed, modern ports of entry. That is an important argument to articulate as the nation ponders spending limited resources on walls and more Border Patrol agents. The agency was short 3,811 officers in 2013, when Congress approved hiring 2,000 more CBP officers. As of August, there were still 1,400 vacancies.

18. Appeals Court Partly Reinstates Trump's New Travel Ban
(New York Times; 29.9M uvm) … Miriam Jordan

A federal appeals court in California on Monday allowed President Trump's latest travel restrictions to partly take effect, ruling that the government can bar entry to people who come from six majority-Muslim countries and who lack ties to the United States, thus handing the administration a momentary victory. In a two-paragraph order, a panel of three judges from the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco ruled on the administration's request to block a lower court's decision, from a federal judge in Hawaii, that prevented the latest travel policy from being implemented. The appeals panel on Monday upheld that ruling for people with a "bona fide relationship" with close family or an entity in the United States, like a university or company. But the court blocked the lower court's decision for people from the six countries without such ties, meaning they can now be kept from entering the United States. The restrictions will apply to travelers from Chad, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Syria and Yemen. The latest ban also blocks travel by certain Venezuelan government officials and most North Koreans; courts have not stopped the administration from enacting the restrictions on those countries.

19. Trump Administration Detaining DACA Recipient With Disability
(HuffPost; 22.9M uvm) … Elise Foley

A 20-year-old undocumented immigrant with Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status has been in ICE detention for a month, despite President Donald Trump's promises not to go after young people with DACA protections, an advocate for the young man said on Monday. Felipe Abonza-Lopez and his advocates say he was picked up in spite of a clean criminal record when he was riding in a car with undocumented family members. CBP confirmed arresting a DACA recipient, and said it was "in the course of a human smuggling investigation." The recipient's "status will be reviewed at an immigration hearing," Border Patrol Chief Patrol Agent Felix Chavez said in a statement. Amy Fischer, the policy director of RAICES, which is assisting with Abonza-Lopez's case, said he was not smuggling and has not been charged with anything. "If CBP is trying to criminalize DACA recipients with mixed status families for driving in a car with their undocumented family members, that is wholly unjust," she said in an email. "We know that ICE will try to detain and deport people who have DACA so long as no one is paying attention to it," Fischer said. CBP said in a statement that the Uvalde County Sheriff's Office asked Border Patrol for assistance after a citizen reported a suspicious vehicle on Oct. 12. The people in the car were then picked up by Border Patrol and later transferred to Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Agents determined that two people in the car had been previously deported and reinstated their orders of removal. They charged an additional person with illegal entry. The other two individuals included a DACA recipient — presumably, Abonza-Lopez.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Obama administration ended the so-called "wet foot, dry foot" policy in January 2017. This part of the Cuban Adjustment Act allowed Cubans without visas to stay in the United States and begin the citizenship process once their feet touched dry land. The looming possibility of the end of "wet foot, dry foot" created a renewed surge of Cubans trying to enter the U.S. in 2016. This meant that many Cubans were on their way to America, either in border towns in Mexico or stranded in countries like Colombia and Brazil, when former President Obama ended the policy. Changing the Cuban Adjustment Act was meant to reflect the normalizing relationship between the U.S. and Cuba after decades of tension and sanctions against the communist Caribbean country. But instead of fostering peace and a safer immigration experience, ending the policy may have generated mass confusion in the Cuban immigrant communities and created a steady new human revenue stream for privately owned detention centers to legally exploit. Combine this with President Trump's plan to increase the number of immigrants detained on any given day from 40,000 to 80,000 people, and the private prison corporations in America stand to double their daily revenue to around $12 million. For Geo Group and CoreCivic, two corporations that own nearly all of the private detention centers in the United States, taking advantage of the political plight of Cubans fleeing their country might just seem like good business sense.

VIDEO: Breitbart News has compiled the five times in which Kirstjen Nielsen, a former official under President George W. Bush, has been out-of-line with Trump's Buy "Buy American, Hire American" policies and immigration principles. Nielsen's most controversial statements on immigration have revolved around her open support for amnesty for Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) illegal aliens...Nielsen's testimony and answers during her hearing did not make any declaration of support — or even any reference to — Trump's detailed 70-point list of immigration principles which were announced on October 8…In the face of Democratic hostility, Nielsen actually downplayed the importance of the wall. Trump's immigration agenda has emphasized putting the U.S. economy and needs of Americans first. But when answering a question about how to deter illegal immigration, Nielsen said she wanted to improve the economies of foreign nations which send their illegal aliens to the United States, even as she declined to talk about more direct countermeasures, such as the construction of a border wall and the enforcement of sanctions against employers who hire illegals. "We have to increase the prosperity there," Nielsen said of foreign countries.

Border Patrol agent-turned-author Francisco Cantú examines his experiences. Cantú is the author of The Line Becomes A River, forthcoming this February from Riverhead Books. The book is a beautiful and brutal chronicle of the four years he spent working as a Border Patrol agent, and the years afterward, in which an immigrant friend, José, is deported to Mexico, and Cantú finds himself navigating border policy from the other end. The book — his first — is already generating buzz; this year Cantú has received a Whiting Award in Nonfiction and a Pushcart Prize, and a section of the book recently aired on This American Life.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.

- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

A group of Senate Democrats is pressing President Donald Trump's choice to lead the Homeland Security Department to endorse bipartisan legislation to shield from deportation thousands of young immigrants brought to the U.S. as young children and living here illegally. In a letter sent Friday to Kirstjen Nielsen, the 20 lawmakers said she agreed during her confirmation hearing earlier this month on the need for legislation that would put so-called "Dreamers" on a path to U.S. citizenship. They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." White House spokesman Raj Shah said Nielsen did not express support for any specific legislation during her confirmation hearing." The Trump administration has laid out its priorities for responsible immigration reform we hope Congress will adopt," Shah said.

"The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

A 17-year-old girl was taken into custody at the El Centro border checkpoint after U.S. officials said Border Patrol agents discovered small packages of methamphetamine taped to her body. Customs and Border Protection officials said the teen was a passenger in a Ford Focus that approached the Highway 86 checkpoint at about 1:15 p.m. Wednesday. Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to DEA officials. Officials did not say if the other vehicle occupants were taken into custody.

A suspected member of a notorious international criminal gang has been arrested in Williston and is being held at the Grand Forks County jail. Border Patrol agents from the Grand Forks Sector of U.S. Customs and Border Protection arrested 39-year-old Concepcion Carcamo-Portillo at 7 p.m. Wednesday, spokesman Kristoffer Grogan confirmed to the Herald. Numerous tips from concerned citizens led officers to the El Salvador national, Grogan said. Investigators determined the man was in the U.S. illegally and is an alleged member of Mara Salvatrucha, also known as the El Salvador-based international criminal organization MS-13. Carcamo-Portillo was booked Thursday evening into the Grand Forks County Correctional Center. "This arrest is a testament to our cooperation with our (Department of Homeland Security)

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. The K-9 alerted an agents to a delivery truck, which led to further inspection, the release states. Agents then found nine packages of methamphetamine, worth more than $260,000, concealed in liquid foam, according to the release.

operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

(Portland Press Herald; 2.1M uvm; Portland, OR) … Phil Whipple

For Farmington native Cassius Clark, the anticipation leading up to Saturday's annual Pro All Stars Series Mega-Meltdown 300 at Hickory Motor Speedway in North Carolina has turned to stress. The team for which Clark drives, King Racing, owned by former racer and Canadian businessman Rollie MacDonald, is stuck at the Canadian border with the car and all of the equipment necessary to run this weekend's race. "They've been delayed at the border cross at Houlton since Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m.," Clark said on the phone from North Carolina. "There was a practice session here yesterday, and there is more on tap for today. It's a 20-hour drive from Houlton to get here, so I sure hope they get released soon." Two other race teams had similar difficulties, Clark said, but were allowed to pass after a lengthy delay. U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

Protection. The project is aimed towards increasing efficiency and improving safety and security for vehicle and pedestrian processing. These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

(Surrey Now-Leader; 17k uvm; Surrey, BC Canada) … Aaron Hinks

A U.S. man is now in jail after Canada Border Services Agency discovered he had an outstanding felony warrant from Washington State. U.S. Customs and Border Protection issued a news release Friday afternoon title "No shirt, no service, no Canada," saying the Tacoma man arrived northbound at the Peace Arch (Douglas) crossing in South Surrey, shirtless, and told officers he was heading to Toronto to visit friends. The release says that during a search of a rental vehicle, CBSA found small amounts of meth. After being returned to Blaine, officers confirmed the 23-year-old had a felony warrant from the Washington State Department of Corrections for robbery and escape from community custody, which was issued Nov. 13. "The co-operation between three government agencies is priceless," U.S. CBP area port director Kenneth Williams said in the release. "CBSA, CBP and the sheriff's office worked as a team to get this suspected criminal off the street."

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down

According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

(Rio Grande Guardian; 9k uvm; McAllen, TX) … Patricia Martinez

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. “Pharr does a great job over there, but it’s one bridge,” said Darling. “There’s just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge.” Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and southbound, Darling said: “I am shooting for the end of 2018. That is why we want to get the design done and get construction going. We are working on that, state monies, federal monies. They have to get their act together in Washington and set a budget and get some funding (going). We will get it done.

public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall's multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. "A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online," Saenz said. "They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. "At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents."

Valley law enforcement agencies and others, along with their K-9s, competed in timed narcotic article and vehicle searches, the obedience and confidence course, and criminal apprehension…If you compete and your dog doesn't do so well, that motivates you," Hidalgo County Sheriff's Office K-9 trainer Javier Solis said… U.S. Border Patrol's K-9, Billy-B, was named top dog in the patrol competition. A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. The U.S. Border Patrol was awarded the Best K-9 Unit, while Lusy with Edinburg CISD Police Department took first in the articles search.

VIDEO: Tom Ridge, the nation's first secretary of Homeland Security, believes the physical border wall President Donald Trump wants to build on the U.S.-Mexico border isn't necessary. "I don't think we need it," Ridge said. "I think there are things we can do with technology that foregoes the need to build a 3,000 mile border [wall] with a neighbor... I prefer presidents that tear down walls rather than build them." Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. Despite his criticism of the President, Ridge, a Republican, praised Mr. Trump's pick to lead the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), Kirstjen Nielsen. "This is a woman that's got public and private sector experience. She's been deputy chief of staff to the president now, she was General [John] Kelly's chief of staff [at DHS], she's well versed and worked with the private sector on preparedness issues and cyber security issues and the like."

(Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. “The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration,” Homan said. “Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That’s why that’s one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with.”

(WOKV-FM; 75.1k uvm; Jacksonville, FL) … Stephanie Brown

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

- WBTS-TV reported that group of Senate Democrats are pressing DHS Secretary nominee Kirstjen Nielsen to support bipartisan legislation that would protect DACA recipients from being deported. They cited that during her confirmation hearing she agreed that there was a need for legislation to protect DACA recipients and help create a path for citizenship. This story has been shared by major media outlets Stars & Stripes, ABC News as well as local outlets such as the Tampa Bay Times, and Florence Morning News, based in Florence, SC. The UK media outlet Daily Mail shared this story as well.
- KIII-TV reported that Border Patrol agents at the Sarita checkpoint arrested a person who had attempted to smuggle cocaine through the checkpoint in the trunk of their Mercedes. "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's ability to smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said. This story has yet to be widely reported on in other media outlets, however on the @CustomsBorder Twitter account, it is the tweet with the highest engagement of the period.
- BuzzFeed reported that an immigrant father, Jose Demar Fuentes, from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. CBP didn't respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. "CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation," the policy said. While this story has yet to be widely reported in other media outlets, it is gaining traction on Twitter since BuzzFeed first ran the article in the early morning hours.

They want to know if that means Nielsen will openly urge Congress to pass the bipartisan Dream Act to "provide the solution that you have recognized is needed." "The efforts they are using to conceal the loads is usually expensive, so this was out of the ordinary for us," said Deputy Patrol Agent in charge of Kingsville Josh Schad. According to agents, usually the cartels try and conceal their drugs loads inside secret compartments of even inside car batteries, but this bust was unusual considering the dog's super sense of smell. "The things they can detect, the minor traces of narcotics they can smell is unbelievable so we couldn't do the job without them," Schad said.    (BuzzFeed; 17.7M) … Adolfo Flores

An immigrant father from Central America seeking asylum in the United States has accused Border Patrol agents of lying and threatening him to persuade him to separate from his 1-year-old son. Immigrant rights advocates said the accusation bolsters what they believe is an effort by Border Patrol agents to discourage Central American immigration by separating parents from their children. Jose Demar Fuentes, 30, said he and three other fathers crossed the US border through the Mexican city of Tijuana on Sunday with their children and requested asylum from US immigration authorities. Fuentes said that in three separate meetings, Border Patrol agents in dark green uniforms told him and the other fathers that if they didn't agree to separate themselves from their children, their immigration cases would take longer and there would be problems. “The last time they said we’d better agree because it was ‘better to do it the good way and avoid using force in front of the kids,’” Fuentes told BuzzFeed News. “That made us all agree.” The fathers and their kids were separated Thursday. The three other fathers could not be reached for comment. US Customs and Border Protection didn’t respond to specific questions about Fuentes or the other fathers, but pointed to their policy on family unity. “CBP will maintain family unity to the greatest extent operationally feasible, absent a legal requirement or an articulable safety or security concern that requires separation,” the policy said.

Border Patrol agents assigned to a checkpoint in East County observed a man approaching in a 2009 Infinity G35 sedan. The driver initiated a U-turn before the checkpoint and drove the wrong way into oncoming traffic, according to information provided to Breitbart Texas by U.S. Border Patrol officials. The driver suddenly executed another U-turn and sped toward the checkpoint–reaching a speed of nearly 70 miles per hour, officials stated. As the driver approached, he swerved out of the lanes of cars waiting for inspection to bypass the position. In doing so, he struck a steel road sign — parts of which struck a Border Patrol agent working nearby. The debris from the sign injured the agent who had to be hospitalized. The driver bypassed the checkpoint and took off on I-8. Agents pursued the fleeing driver. The pursuit reached speeds in excess of 100 mph, officials reported. Suddenly, the driver lost control of the G35 and crashed on a berm. After climbing out of the car, the driver fled on foot. As other agents arrived on the scene, they secured the two occupants and checked them for injuries. Finding none, the agents placed the male passengers under arrest. Other agents pursued the driver on foot. The agents found the driver hiding in the garage of a private home, officials explained. They took the man into custody. An investigation revealed the 27-year-old driver and the two male passengers, ages 27 and 40, were all illegally present in the U.S. The driver faces charges of transporting aliens illegally present in the United States, officials reported. All three Mexican nationals are being held in federal custody.

Officials said three other people were in the vehicle. According to officials, a canine team alerted agents to something suspicious in the vehicle. During a secondary inspection, agents found 10 small packages taped to the teen girl's legs. Officials said the packages -- which weighed a combined 4.21 pounds with an estimated street value of $14,735 -- "were tested and contained the properties consistent with methamphetamine." The drugs and the girl, who is a U.S. citizen, were turned over to

VIDEO: An Albuquerque man, suspected in a possible kidnapping, surrendered to authorities at the Border Patrol checkpoint north of Las Cruces on Thursday. Epifanio Torres, 30, was charged with aggravated fleeing, a fourth degree felony. Other charges are pending, according to New Mexico State Police. State police said the incident began about 8:29 p.m. when they issued a "be on the lookout" (BOLO) for a red Ford F-150 pickup in reference to a possible kidnapping in Albuquerque. Authorities said information was received from an out-of-state relative, who had been on the phone with a female, reportedly in the backseat of the pickup. The suspect and female had been in a relationship, state police reported. About 45 minutes after the BOLO, state police officers spotted the vehicle traveling south on I-25, near mile post 68. An officer attempted to stop the vehicle, police said, but it did not stop and the driver continued southbound. State Police notified Border Patrol agents at the I-25 checkpoint of the ongoing pursuit. Torres, who was on the phone with the Albuquerque NMSP office, told authorities he would surrender at the checkpoint, which he did without incident, police said. The female passenger was checked by authorities and refused transport to a hospital, police said.

The alert from the K-9 came during a non-intrusive vehicle inspection at the checkpoint. Agents then inspected the truck of the vehicle and found three suitcases with about 185 pounds of cocaine, according to a news release. Drug Enforcement Administration agents took the vehicle, 32 bundles of cocaine, valued at $5,844,800, and took the driver, a U.S. citizen, into custody, the release states. On Tuesday, agents at the Brownsville Border Patrol Station seized more than 8 pounds of methamphetamine after they were alerted by another K-9. The K-9 alerted an agents to a delivery truck, which led to further inspection, the release states. Agents then found nine packages of methamphetamine, worth more than $260,000, concealed in liquid foam, according to the release.

   (Corpus Christi Caller-Times; 191k uvm; Corpus Christi, TX) …Chris Ramirez

VIDEO: An El Salvadoran man with ties to the violent street gang MS-13 and a criminal record in his homeland was among those arrested in a Border Patrol operation near Hebbronville. Border Patrol agents arrested an undocumented immigrant Tuesday, according to a news release from the agency. He was among a group of 16 immigrants who were on a ranch near Hebbronville. The Border Patrol said the man, whose identity was not released, had an extensive criminal history in his native country. He had served an eight-year prison sentence there for a homicide conviction and also had a record for illegal possession of a firearm, aggravated robbery and drug trafficking. He was processed for deportation. On Thursday, Border Patrol agents arrested another undocumented immigrant who is believed to be associated with MS-13 near Bruni, in Webb County. That person, also from El Salvador, was processed for deportation. The Trump administration has pledged to get MS-13 and other trans-national gangs off America's streets. The gang is believed to have started in Los Angeles in the 1980s, but became more deeply entrenched in Central America when its leaders were deported. There was no indication immediately that the individuals' arrests were in any way connected to "Operation Raging Bull," a crackdown run conducted by officials from the Department of Homeland Security and Justice Department. That operation ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 11, and concluded with the arrest of 214 members of MS-13.

    (Portland Press Herald; 2.1M uvm; Portland, OR) … Phil Whipple

For Farmington native Cassius Clark, the anticipation leading up to Saturday's annual Pro All Stars Series Mega-Meltdown 300 at Hickory Motor Speedway in North Carolina has turned to stress. The team for which Clark drives, King Racing, owned by former racer and Canadian businessman Rollie MacDonald, is stuck at the Canadian border with the car and all of the equipment necessary to run this weekend's race. "They've been delayed at the border cross at Houlton since Tuesday afternoon at 2 p.m.," Clark said on the phone from North Carolina. "There was a practice session here yesterday, and there is more on tap for today. It's a 20-hour drive from Houlton to get here, so I sure hope they get released soon." Two other race teams had similar difficulties, Clark said, but were allowed to pass after a lengthy delay. U.S. Customs and Border Protections Public Affairs Officer Stephanie Malin on Friday afternoon released a statement on the matter: "While I cannot get into the specific details of the inspection, I can confirm the individuals were not detained at the port of entry at all," she wrote, "The issue is related to a lack of proper importation documents required for importing a vehicle for racing purposes.

11. City officials get a tour of the international bridges
(KGNS-TV; 87k uvm; Laredo, TX) … Phil Whipple

VIDEO:A tour of bridge one and two was given to city officials on both sides of the border as they took a look at the status of the ongoing construction project. According to CBP, construction at both br1idge one and two is coming along fine. Congressman Henry Cuellar, Mayor Pete Saenz, and Nuevo Laredo and Laredo officials toured both facilities with U.S. General Services Administration and Customs and Border Protection. The project is aimed towards increasing efficiency and improving safety and security for vehicle and pedestrian processing. These updates should reduce vehicle wait times from 33 to 15 minutes and peak pedestrian time from 49 to 21 minutes. Mayor Peete Saenz says there have been talks between him and Nuevo Laredo about the idea of turning bridge one into a pedestrian walkway. Mayor Saenz says CBP has been supportive of the idea and now it's up to him and City Council to decided and work with Nuevo Laredo to see if it's possible. The projected completion dates for bridge one is April 2018 and December 2018 for bridge two.

12. 'No shirt, no service, no Canada'
(Surrey Now-Leader; 17k uvm; Surrey, BC Canada) … Aaron Hinks

A U.S. man is now in jail after Canada Border Services Agency discovered he had an outstanding felony warrant from Washington State. U.S. Customs and Border Protection issued a news release Friday afternoon title "No shirt, no service, no Canada," saying the Tacoma man arrived northbound at the Peace Arch (Douglas) crossing in South Surrey, shirtless, and told officers he was heading to Toronto to visit friends. The release says that during a search of a rental vehicle, CBSA found small amounts of meth. After being returned to Blaine, officers confirmed the 23-year-old had a felony warrant from the Washington State Department of Corrections for robbery and escape from community custody, which was issued Nov. 13. "The co-operation between three government agencies is priceless," U.S. CBP area port director Kenneth Williams said in the release. "CBSA, CBP and the sheriff's office worked as a team to get this suspected criminal off the street."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

VIDEO: President Donald Trump is demanding Congress fund the construction of a wall along America's border with Mexico. Work has already begun, with eight prototypes of new structures recently being showcased in San Diego. In the new series "America's Wall," KPBS and inewsource obtained previously unseen federal documents that detail the existing barriers along the border built under several previous administrations. The series also profiles people on both sides of the border, and both sides of a contentious issue.

14. Fisher's border wall prototype complete on Southern border
(Dickinson Press; 192k uvm; Dickinson, ND) … Grady McGregor

Dickinson-based Fisher Industries has completed construction of a border wall prototype along the southern border of the United States near Otay Mesa, Cali. Fisher's wall is made of concrete and while it lacks some of the color and features of other prototypes, like tubing atop the walls or opaque paneling, the wall's simplicity makes it look like one of the more imposing designs. U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) announced that the eight border wall prototypes were completed in late October but this is the first time that the Press has been able to track down available pictures of Fisher's wall prototype. According to a CBP press release from late last month, now that the construction phase is complete they will test and evaluate each wall over a 30- to 60-day period. "Border security contributes to our overall national security and relies on a combination of border infrastructure, technology, personnel, and partnerships," said CBP acting Deputy Commissioner Ron Vitiello in the release. "Border walls have proven to be an extremely effective part of our multi-pronged security strategy to prevent the illegal migration of people and drugs over the years ... These border enforcement zones give our men and women of CBP the best possible conditions to maintain a safe and secure border."

15. Darling: Fully loaded trucks crossing Anzalduas Bridge by end of 2018
(Rio Grande Guardian; 9k uvm; McAllen, TX) … Patricia Martinez

McAllen Mayor Jim Darling said that the city is moving forward with plans to have full commercial traffic at the Anzalduas International Bridge by the end of 2018. Since August 2016, the bridge has allowed empty southbound trucks to cross into Mexico. Now, design plans are being finalized for fully loaded trucks to cross the bridge in either direction, giving commercial drivers the option of another port of entry. The plan is to have a joint inspection facility on the north side of the bridge. "Pharr does a great job over there, but it's one bridge," said Darling. "There's just so much potential in our area to only have one. So, we need to get commercial traffic on another bridge." Asked when the bridge may ready to handle loaded trucks going both north- and southbound, Darling said: "I am shooting for the end of 2018. That is why we want to get the design done and get construction going. We are working on that, state monies, federal monies.

(Seattle PI; 4.7M uvm; Seattle WA)

Nonstop flights from Seattle to Dublin will start next spring. The Seattle Times reports Irish carrier Aer Lingus said Friday the service will begin May 18, 2018. The service will be provided four times a week. Because Dublin airport has its own U.S. Customs and Border Protection facility, passengers and their luggage will be pre-cleared in Ireland before departure, with no need to go through passport control on arrival in Seattle. This will be the first pre-cleared trans-Atlantic flight to fly into Seattle. Aer Lingus also will provide Seattle passengers connections through Dublin to 24 U.K. and European cities.

VIDEO: U.S. Customs and Border Protection has tips for international travelers coming to the U.S. during the holiday season. U.S. Customs and Border Protection public information officer Maribel Saenz says the agency is preparing for the large number of shoppers that cross the border during the holiday season, especially after La Plaza Mall's multi-million dollar expansion. Saenz recommends international travelers to apply online for the I-94 form. "A lot of times since it's holiday season, there is a lot more travelers than usual, so that's why we are encouraging everybody to go online, apply online," Saenz said. "They can pay for it online, they bring their receipt with them and we finalize it for them here at the port of entry." To finalize the I-94 process, travelers must present themselves at a port of entry within seven days of their application. Travelers are also encouraged to use their radio frequency identification card to use ready lanes at port of entries. The frequency identification card includes the newer version of the U.S. passport cards, border crossing cards and resident alien card. Saenz says using this method expedites the entry process by 20 percent. "At the window, they will be getting their fingerprints, their picture and a background check to make sure that they qualify for the I-94 and cardboard," said Saenz. "I-94 will be printed and that's what they will have to present at the checkpoint with their travel documents." CBP's Border Wait Times app also gives hourly updates on lines at each port of entry.

criminal apprehension…If you compete and your dog doesn't do so well, that motivates you," Hidalgo County Sheriff's Office K-9 trainer Javier Solis said… U.S. Border Patrol's K-9, Billy-B, was named top dog in the patrol competition. A Belgian Malinois named Mischa and her handler, Tim Behnke, with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, quickly ran the narcotic article and vehicle searches Friday afternoon. Mischa has stopped more than $1 million worth of drugs from being smuggled into the U.S. during her more than three years as a law enforcement K-9, according Behnke. Behnke and Mischa underwent a seven-week training course in Virginia prior to working together at multiple ports of entry in Brownsville. The two have been a team for three and a half years. "It's the best job in the world," Benke said. "Working with an animal is awesome." Though Behnke didn't place in the vehicles search competition, U.S. Customs and Border Protection's K-9 Coco and his handler, Michael Hufham, placed third. The U.S. Border Patrol was awarded the Best K-9 Unit, while Lusy with Edinburg CISD Police Department took first in the articles search.

CBP's Air and Marine Operations agents from air and marine branches and units in Florida and Texas are assisting with security efforts for the event providing real-time aerial video to ground based law enforcement personnel at the incident command center. Air and Marine Operations interdicts unlawful people and cargo approaching U.S. borders, investigates criminal networks and provides domain awareness in the air and maritime environments, and responds to contingencies and national taskings. "We're a part of this community and honored to serve and protect the public in Greater Miami and the Florida Keys utilizing advanced aeronautical and maritime capabilities," said Martin Wade, Director of the Miami Air and Marine Branch. "I don't think we need it," Ridge said. "I think there are things we can do with technology that foregoes the need to build a 3,000 mile border [wall] with a neighbor... I prefer presidents that tear down walls rather than build them." Ridge appeared on "The Takeout" podcast with CBS News chief White House correspondent Major Garrett and political director Steve Chaggaris. Despite his criticism of the President, Ridge, a Republican, praised Mr. Trump's pick to lead the Department of

(Newsweek; 9.4M uvm) … Nicole Rodriguez

VIDEO: A 20-year-old disabled immigrant detained for more than a month without being charged was to be freed Friday, but he has been stripped of his Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals status. After being detained by Customs and Border Protection (CPB) agents on October 11 as part of a human smuggling investigation, Felipe Abonza-Lopez of San Marcos, Texas, was granted a $7,500 bond and will be released sometime Friday, a legal assistant for Abonza-Lopez's attorney told Newsweek Friday. Abonza-Lopez has lost his DACA status, which had been set to expire in 2019. It was revoked October 12, when he received a notice to appear in immigration court for deportation proceedings, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Services (ICE) told Newsweek.

22. Trump Administration Cites MS-13 Arrest to Push Change in Minor Immigrant Law
(Daily Signal; 1.1M uvm) … Fred Lucas

The Trump administration is pointing to a large federal roundup of members of the violent gang MS-13 as vindication of increased enforcement efforts and reason to change the policy on unaccompanied minor illegal immigrants. The Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security announced a joint effort that led to the arrest of 214 gang members and those involved with gang-related crime…Of the 214, just 16 were U.S. citizens while 198 were foreign nationals. Of the foreign nationals, only five were in the country legally. Among those arrested, 64 entered the country as unaccompanied alien children, but most are now adults, according to the Trump administration. During a press conference Thursday announcing the arrests, Tom Homan, deputy director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, noted the 2008 law on unaccompanied minors does not allow them to be immediately returned to their country of origin. "The agencies sent up a series of policy requests to the Hill to address a lot of issues to further control the border and illegal immigration," Homan said. "Some of these policies are being exploited and used by criminal organizations. That's why that's one of the policy issues we asked Congress to look at and help us with."

"It is in the interest of the University, as well as in the national interest, to welcome talented persons of all nations to study, teach, and do research in the United States, in order to maintain and improve America's position as a leader in higher education and research," read the statement, signed by Loh Oct. 10.

(Reuters; 43.6M uvm) …David Shepardson and Eric Beech

U.S. President Donald Trump said in a tweet on Friday he is putting a decision to allow imports of elephant trophies on hold after a torrent of criticism from conservation advocates and across social media. Trump's reversal came hours after his administration released a rule on Friday to allow hunters who kill elephants in Zimbabwe to bring their trophies back to the United States, which had been banned by the Obama administration. "Put big game trophy decision on hold until such time as I review all conservation facts. Under study for years. Will update soon with Secretary Zinke. Thank you!" Trump wrote. Interior Secretary Ryan Zinke said in a statement that he had spoken with Trump and "both believe that conservation and healthy herds are critical." He said the "issuing of permits is being put on hold as the decision is being reviewed."

25. 18-year-old accused of shooting CBP agent in Oakleaf said he would "off" cops, according to investigators
(WOKV-FM; 75.1k uvm; Jacksonville, FL) … Stephanie Brown

Two months after a Customs and Border Protection Agent was shot in the parking lot of an Oakleaf Publix, new investigative reports are detailing more about the possible motive to the attack. The Clay County Sheriff's Office believed from early in their investigation that the agent was ambushed because he was law enforcement. The victim was leaving the Publix after grabbing some groceries, when CCSO says 18-year-old Jake Lewis sped up and fired multiple shots, hitting the agent multiple times. Lewis then crashed, and CCSO says he died of a self-inflicted gunshot. The agent who was shot underwent surgery and continues to recover. CBP tells us the "signs are encouraging", and the agent is expected to return on limited duty in the near future. That agent has spoken with investigators, and the new supplemental reports show he remembers a suspect pointing a gun out of a car and yelling about hating cops, before shooting.

All,
It is CBP's and OPA's policy to treat everyone with whom we interact with dignity and respect. Whether an illegal alien or alleged (or even convicted) criminal, all are human, and should be treated humanely.

In our job as communicators, we must reinforce that message in every form of communication, from social media to the web, from print to broadcast media, we must guard against using language that detracts from that inherent dignity and respect.

I understand that social media is far more conversational than traditional media and often uses creative word play to attract readers or followers, or better, re-tweets of our messages. However, this is where we need to ensure we're not making light of an individuals' circumstance. I cite as an example the use of 'catch of the day' which is appropriate for fish, or substances interdicted, but not in reference to people.

There is no way to create a list of appropriate or inappropriate terms, so I rely on your judgment as PAOs to ensure we maintain the highest standards in all our forms of communication.

Very respectfully,

Commissioner,

Bulletin Intelligence posted a good summary below of coverage from the last 24 hours.

As stated below, coverage dominated the news. Think we (CBP) came out ok, all things considered.

Much of the coverage focused on the reaction to the policy and those who either supported it or vowed to fight it.

Notable quotes were from technology companies, airlines, immigration advocates and government officials both in the US and abroad.

There was some points to CBP to consider in the coverage.

Some stories stated that officers were apologetic about their role in enforcing the EO. Immigration attorneys were quoted saying some ports are more lenient than others and that those effected should try those more lenient airports.

Media also reported un-named sources who stated that they were not aware of the order until it was already in effect.

Media also reported widespread confusion around the world about the order and whether it applies to them, especially now with the court orders.

Airlines were concerned about crew members who were affected.

Reuters reported that there was widespread confusion within DHS and CBP about how to interpret the EO and apply it at the ports. For example, one in-named official discussed confusion about what "national interest" means.

Leading DHS News:

JUDGE ORDERS STAY ON TRUMP EXECUTIVE ORDER AS HUNDREDS DETAINED. US District Judges Anne Donnelly and Leonie Brinkema on Saturday night granted an emergency stay on President Trump's executive order as hundreds of citizens of Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen were detained in airports worldwide and prevented from traveling to the US. Media coverage reached saturation levels as the network newscasts devoted nearly half of their combined broadcasts to the ensuing protests and to the White House's defense of the measure. Reporting in print and online also dominated the news and was almost uniformly critical of the executive order and of lawmakers defending the Administration.

The New York Post (1/28, Bain, Boniello, 3.82M) reports Donnelly granted the American Civil Liberties Union's request to "stop...the Trump administration's deportations of hundreds of travelers who arrived in the US on Friday and Saturday from seven predominately Muslim countries." The Washington Post (1/28, Markon, Brown, Shaver, 11.43M) reports "minutes after the judge's ruling in New York, another came in Virginia when US District Judge Leonie Brinkema issued a temporary restraining order to block the removal of any green-card holders being detained at Dulles International Airport for seven days." According to the Post, "Brinkema's action also ordered that lawyers have access to those held there because of the president's ban."

ABC World News Tonight's (1/28, story 2, 2:40, Vega, 14.63M) David Wright reported Trump "brush[ed] off the shock waves from the policies he set in motion [Friday] at the Pentagon." Trump said, "This is the protection of the nation from foreign terrorists' entry into the United States. We all know what that means." USA Today (1/28, Stanglin, Gomez, 5.28M) says the President told reporters, "It's working out very nicely," The Hill (1/28, Fabian, 1.25M) reports Trump said, "You see it at the airports, you see it all over," and Bloomberg Politics (1/28, Van Voris, 201K) states that he "defended his order" and insisted, "It's not a Muslim ban."

The Huffington Post (1/28, Foley, 237K) reports Trump also asserted his Administration was "totally prepared" for the response. According to Reuters (1/28, Mason), the President "said the moves would protect Americans from terrorism, in a swift and stern delivery on a campaign promise" and he pledged, "We're going to have a very, very strict ban and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years."

The Washington Post (1/28, Markon, Brown, Nakamura, 11.43M) says Trump's order "rippled across the world on Saturday" as the White House "rushed to explain and defend its action, saying it strengthens national security and denying that it targeted Muslims." A senior Administration official said, "The notion that this is a Muslim ban is ludicrous," while another official "noted that many majority-Muslim countries, including Afghanistan, Pakistan and Turkey, were excluded from the measure." The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Nicholas, Paletta, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) quotes a senior official asserting, "there is a serious concern about the degree to which our immigration programs have been abused by those who are not properly admissible." The official added, "To ensure that the risk is at least being minimized while new screening and vetting standards are established, it is only common-sensical to limit admissions from among some of the most high risk territories in the world identified by Congress."

The Washington Times (1/28, Dinan, 272K) reports a senior Administration official briefing reporters said, "The exemptions and waiver process that we've put in place are already working exactly as intended," and "went on to say that even with the new restrictions and a halt to admissions from a number of countries, the U.S. will still be more open than any other country." The official explained, "We're still admitting and processing more people than any other country in the history of civilization. We're still letting in more people from more war-torn regions than any country in the history of civilization." In addition, NBC Nightly News' (1/28, story 3, 2:15, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) Kasie Hunt reported that a senior Administration official spoke "with government agencies to try to clear [the detentions] on a, quote, 'case-by-case basis.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, El-Ghobashy, Schwartz, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports a State Department official confirmed the 90-day visa ban applies to citizens of the seven countries named in the executive order who hold dual nationality with another nation as well, but not those with US citizenship nor individuals with diplomatic visas. In an email, Gillian Christensen, acting Department of Homeland Security spokeswoman, told Reuters (1/28, Chiacu) that the order "will bar green card holders" from the select countries from entering the US. In a separate article, Reuters (1/28, Mason, Rampton) states that another official said legal permanent residents are "being cleared on a case-by-case basis and being moved expeditiously." The official also "defended the scope and execution of the new rules, saying it moved with 'astonishing rapidity' but worked as intended."

The Hill (1/27, Hensch, 1.25M) reports the President's order also "tasked top administration officials with providing recurring information about terrorism, gender-based violence and 'honor killings.'" Trump ordered the Secretary of Homeland Security and the Attorney General to provide "information regarding the number of foreign nationals who have been charged with terrorism-related offenses in the United States" as well as those "convicted of terrorism-related offenses," "removed from the United States based on terrorism-related activity," or who provided "material support to a terrorism-related organization."

However, two Federal officials told NBC News (1/28, Ali, 2.67M) reports "that immigration officers may have been stopping and even banning valid visa holders from returning to the country weeks before the official directive." They "confirmed...that as many as 40 individuals with F1 student visas, many who left the country for winter break, were told their visas were revoked when they returned stateside to resume classes." One of the officials said, "My advice to anyone holding a visa from any of these countries is do not go home because you will not get back in."

According to a front-page New York Times (1/28, A1, Shear, Kulish, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) article, "The high-stakes legal case played out on Saturday amid global turmoil, as the executive order signed by the president slammed shut the borders of the United States for an Iranian scientist headed to a lab in Massachusetts, a Syrian refugee family headed to a new life in Ohio and countless others across the world." The AP (1/28, Caldwell) says "the immediate fallout from Trump's order meant that an untold number of foreign-born US residents now traveling outside the US could be stuck overseas for at least 90 days – despite holding permanent residency 'green cards' or other visas."

The New York Times (1/28, Erdbrink, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports "panic reigned" among Iranian travelers who "were turned back from flights to the United States" or "were held or deported" at US airports, "rights groups and airline representatives said." The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) also highlights travelers from countries affected by the order who have been stopped at airports abroad and barred from boarding aircraft bound for the US, which the Washington Post (1/28, A1, Fahim, Salim, 11.43M) reports on its front page turned these airports into a "limbo." Labeeb Ali, an interpreter for an American security company in Iraq, said the Administration has "killed my dream" of moving to the US when officials in Qatar "prevented him from boarding a flight to Texas" even though he already had a visa. He is now filled with "despair and regret at having already sold his business and belongings in Iraq."

The AP (1/28) similarly describes the "despair and confusion" among citizens of countries affected by the order seeking asylum in the US, like "Hameed Khalid Darweesh, a translator and assistant for the US military in Iraq for 10 years now fleeing death threats," who "walked free midday Friday after his lawyers and two members of congress went to the airport to try and gain his release. ... Others were less lucky."

Maha al-Obaidi, formerly of Iraq, still lives in New York, but the New York Times (1/28, Otis, Sweis, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says her "family is divided" as "her husband and two sons in Jordan are for now locked out of the United States, and Ms. Obaidi cannot travel away, or risk being denied re-entry." The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Ryan, Etehad, 4.52M) also profiles some families "divided by Trump's refugee order" as they "worry about the future."

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Jordan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports the ACLU filed a lawsuit on behalf of two Iraqis detained at John F. Kennedy Airport, one of whom, the Washington Times (1/28, Dinan, 272K) reports, was "an interpreter and engineer who was to be admitted under a program rewarding those who helped the US efforts in Iraq, at risk to themselves. The man's family was admitted, but he was detained." The Times adds "the other man was coming to the US to rejoin his wife and seven-year-old son, who were admitted as refugees three years ago." The Huffington Post (1/28, Frej, Murdock, 237K) identifies them as "Hameed Khalid Darweesh and Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, Iraqis with ties to US operations overseas."

NBC Nightly News' (1/28, story 2, 0:55, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) Pete Williams said lawyers claimed "both the Constitution and existing immigration laws don't allow the president to order this kind of restriction" because it "violates the Constitution's ban on discrimination by treating people differently based on where they're from, their country of origin," and "a Federal law that's been on the books for more than 60 years says that no one can be, quote, 'discriminated against in the issuance of an immigrant visa because of the person's race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence.'" Politico (1/28, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports a California attorney also "filed a federal lawsuit Saturday broadly challenging" the order in the US District Court for Northern California and he "argues that the order intrudes on Congress' legislative authority and violates the Establishment Clause of the Constitution by discriminating on the basis of religion."

Meanwhile, Kenneth Craig, in the lead story for the CBS Weekend News (1/28, lead story, 2:35, Ninan), reported "protests erupted" at several US airports "as Federal authorities scrambled to figure out how to enforce the ban." ABC World News Tonight's (1/28, lead story, 4:10, Vega, 14.63M) Cecilia Vega said “protests were swift,” and correspondent Eva Pilgrim reported that at New York’s JFK airport, dozens of passengers had thus far been detained.

The Hill (1/28, Seipel, 1.25M) “Briefing Room” blog similarly describes “massive crowds” at JFK airport, which the AP (1/28, Mathis) says “became a scene of anguish and desperation Saturday for the families of people detained after arriving in the U.S. from nations subject to...Trump’s travel ban.” According to the Huffington Post (1/28, Papenfuss, 237K), New York City cab drivers briefly went on strike and joined demonstrators on the streets near JFK’s Terminal 4 to protest the President’s “crackdown on refugees and support travelers trapped by his executive order.” Politico (1/28, Mahoney, 2.46M) reports New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo also said Saturday that he had “directed the Port Authority, the Department of State, and my Counsel’s Office to jointly explore all legal options to assist anyone detained at New York airports, and ensure that their rights are protected.”

Other cities and airports were also the scene of demonstrations, according the Huffington Post (1/28, Foley, 237K), which reports of “large crowds...at San Francisco International Airport, Chicago O’Hare International Airport and Washington Dulles International Airport.” USA Today (1/28, Adely, 5.28M) notes “more than 120 people gathered at Newark Liberty International Airport clutching signs denouncing the executive order, alongside lawyers who rushed to airports to defend the rights of refugees, immigrants and green-card holders, among others, who were being detained and denied entry.” In a separate piece, USA Today (1/28, 5.28M) says US immigrants “watched in trepidation” and said the President “is trying to divide us.”

The Boston Globe (1/28, Fleming, Schick, 1.08M) says “more than 300 gathered in Chinatown Saturday afternoon to protest President Trump’s controversial executive order.” In a second article, the Boston Globe (1/28, O'Sullivan, 1.08M) reports aides of Massachusetts Gov. Charlie Baker stated the Republican “opposes the immigrant ban” as well as “applying religious tests to the refugee system and believes that focusing on countries’ predominant religions will not make the US any safer.” In an email, spokesman Brendan Moss said Baker “believes the federal government should focus on improving the techniques and systems in place to stop dangerous people from entering the country, regardless of the nation they seek to strike from.”

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/28, Charles, Sweet, Hendrickson, 798K) reports “at least 13 people remained under detention at O’Hare International Airport,” where “dozens of attorneys crowded the international terminal...offering pro bono legal aid to anyone who said their family members” were detained. The Chicago Tribune (1/28, Wong, Clair, 2.54M) states that “as many as 18 people [were being] held at O’Hare because of the order, according to lawyers working with the International Refugee Assistance Project.”

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Pearce, Smith, 4.52M) reports about a dozen immigration attorneys were also “gathered at the Tom Bradley International Terminal at LAX international terminal to help travelers, mostly from Iran, who have been detained.” The Service Employees International Union organized “a candlelight vigil to support Muslim refugees” at LAX while a separate protest was also held in downtown Los Angeles.

The lead NBC Nightly News (1/28, lead story, 3:10, Diaz-Balart, 16.61M) segment said the protests have “become a backdrop for politicians and lawyers calling for people to be released. But many of President Trump’s supporters applaud him for keeping a key campaign promise.” Republicans were more “positive, if more muted” toward the order, which “could prove popular politically,” the New York Times (1/28, A1, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says on its front page, noting that “during the presidential campaign, public opinion polls showed that about half of Americans favored the broader, more bluntly religion-based measure Mr. Trump originally called for, a ban on Muslims entering the country.”

The Washington Post (1/28, Snell, Demirjian, Debonis, 11.43M) reports that while “several congressional Republicans on Saturday questioned” the order, House Speaker Ryan “continued to defend it,” as did House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Ed Royce. According to the Post, Reps. Charlie Dent and Justin Amash were “among the few GOP members to air [their] concerns publicly.” The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Andrews, Peterson, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) similarly says most Republicans were silent on the order, and while Sen. Ben Sasse said the measure was “too broad,” Rep. Duncan Hunter praised the order as a “time out” and explained, “The goal here isn’t to hurt anybody who wants to be an American.”

The Huffington Post (1/28, Foley, 237K) reports Amash, Dent, Sasse and Sens. Jeff Flake and Susan Collins are the only Republican lawmakers who have “said they opposed Trump’s executive order.” In a separate article that calls out Ryan’s support, the Huffington Post (1/28, Bendery, 237K) emphasizes that “it’s not just rank-and file Republicans trying to duck the issue,” adding that Senate Majority Leader McConnell “hasn’t said a peep.” Politico (1/28, Bresnahan, Bresnahan, 2.46M) notes “McConnell plans to make his position known during a Sunday morning TV interview.”

In contrast, according to the Huffington Post (1/28, Levine, 237K), “Democratic lawmakers harshly and unequivocally condemned” the order. The Hill (1/28, Byrnes, 1.25M) reports Senate Minority Leader Schumer said he called Homeland Security Secretary Kelly “to urge the administration to rescind these anti-American executive actions that will do absolutely nothing to improve our safety.” He also condemned the order as “mean-spirited and un-American in their origin, and implemented in a way that has caused chaos and confusion across the country,” adding, “They will only serve to embolden and inspire those around the globe who would do us harm. They must be reversed, immediately.” The Washington Times (1/28, Blake, 272K) reports House Minority Leader Pelosi said Friday, “As the Statue of Liberty holds her torch of welcome high, there are tears in her eyes as she sees how low this Administration has stooped in its callousness toward mothers and children escaping war-torn Syria.”

The Hill (1/28, Greenwood, 1.25M) reports Rep. Adam Schiff, the ranking member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, sent a letter to DHS Secretary Kelly that “blasted Trump’s order, saying that it ran counter to ‘the principles of religious liberty, equality, and compassion that our nation was founded upon.’” He warned, “The capricious enforcement of this order is likely to heighten its harmful effects and present legal and constitutional issues.” The Washington Post (1/28, Weigel, 11.43M) reports Rep. Keith Ellison, the first Muslim member of Congress and a candidate for chair of the Democratic National Committee, “said in an interview Saturday that opponents of President Trump’s executive orders on immigration and refugees should oppose them in the streets.” He asserted, “It’s time for people to get active, to get involved, to vote and to organize. Trump must be stopped, and people power is what we have at our disposal to make him stop. We need mass rallies. We need them all over the country.”

The Hill (1/28, Greenwood, 1.25M) “Briefing Room” blog reports Sen. Bernie Sanders tweeted Saturday, “Trump’s anti-Muslim order plays into the hands of fanatics wishing to harm America. Love and compassion trump hatred and intolerance.” He added, “Demagogues survive by fostering hatred. We won’t allow anyone to divide us up by our religion, country of origin or the color of our skin.” In a different piece, The Hill (1/27, Seipel, 1.25M) stated Sen. Elizabeth Warren on Friday “went on a tweetstorm against” the order, saying, “Let’s be clear: A Muslim ban by any other name is still a Muslim ban” and arguing that the “order restricting immigrants from Muslim countries & freezing admission of refugees is a betrayal of American values.”

In a Huffington Post (1/27, Murphy, 237K) op-ed, Sen. Chris Murphy, a member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, also condemned the order, which he warned, “is likely to get Americans killed.” The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Abi-Habib, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports Rep. Seth Moulton, a former Marine Corps officer, is concerned the order will additionally hurt Iraqi interpreters, like Laith al-Haydar, 41, who are still waiting for visas.

World Leaders, UN Condemn Visa Ban. Jonathan Vigliotti of the CBS Weekend News (1/28, story 3, 1:55, Ninan) reported, “elsewhere around the world, relations with Trump are thin, if not already fraying, after a week of controversial executive orders, including a ban on refugees and citizens from seven Muslim nations, including Iran.” Iranian President Hassan Rouhani asserted, “Today is the day of reconciliation,” and “not a day of creating distance between nations.”

USA Today (1/28, Keveney, 5.28M) reports Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif also “issued a series of tweets in response to President Trump’s order, saying the move would be ‘a great gift to extremists and their supporters.'" According to USA Today, "Other world leaders, including officials from Canada and Scotland, also tweeted responses to the new US policy." Reuters (1/28, Mason, Allen) reports the order "drew widespread criticism from U.S. Western allies including France and Germany, Arab-American groups and human rights organizations."

In a separate article, Reuters (1/28, Nebehay) reports that on Saturday, the United Nations Refugee Agency and the International Organization for Migration "called on the Trump administration...to continue offering asylum to people fleeing war and persecution, saying its resettlement programme was vital." AFP (1/28) quotes Stephane Dujarric, a UN spokesman, saying, "We hope that the measures concerning the suspension of refugee flows are temporary as refugee protection needs have never been greater." He added, "The US resettlement program is one of the most important ones in the world."

Advocacy Groups Condemn Order Suspending US Refugee Program. The Wall Street Journal (1/27, Jordan, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports civil rights and faith organizations are condemning the President for temporarily suspending the US refugee program; the US last interrupted the program in 2001 for three months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

While the Boston Globe (1/28, Allen, 1.08M) states that "people working to resettle refugees and immigrants reacted with heartbreak and anger Saturday to President Trump's executive order," the New York Times (1/28, Kantor, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports on its front page that "resettlement agencies said that volunteers had been swarming their offices and that even more had surfaced last week when Mr. Trump's specific plans became public."

David Miliband, the President and CEO of the International Rescue Committee, writes in a New York Times (1/27, Miliband, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) op-ed that the President's order "is a repudiation of fundamental American values, an abandonment of the United States' role as a humanitarian leader and, far from protecting the country from extremism, a propaganda gift to those who would plot harm to America."

In a Washington Post (1/28, Zeller, 11.43M) op-ed, Afghan war veteran Matt Zeller, the co-founder and CEO of No One Left Behind, laments that the President "has shut the door on thousands of foreign interpreters, our wartime allies, who have served alongside our military since 2001." He argues that the "troubling" and "sweeping ban doesn't take into account that our allied military translators are quite possibly the most vetted individuals aligned with our military." He concludes "these men and women have served our country honorably" for years and if Trump does not exempt them from the order, the Administration will be "permanently harming the fabric of U.S. national security. Our credibility is forever tarnished if not eroded."

In a Politico Magazine (1/28, Hassoun) op-ed, Mostafa Hassoun, a Syrian refugee living in the US, describes the "extreme vetting" process that his family had to undergo to come to the country and warns that the President's order "would have made it difficult, if not impossible for me to find safety in America." According to Hassoun, "There is probably nobody in the world that knows me better than the United States government. ... President Trump knows both who I am and where I'm from, and a whole lot more. If there is something else he'd like to know – anything short of my family renouncing its Syrian and Muslim identities – I can't imagine what it might be."

Silicon Valley Executives Criticize Executive Order. The Washington Post (1/28, A1, Fung, Jan, 11.43M) reports on its front page that in response to the order, "the country's leading tech companies are recalling overseas employees and sharply criticizing President Trump." The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Nicas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) identifies Alphabet Inc.'s Google, Apple Inc., Facebook Inc., Microsoft Corp., and Uber Technologies Inc. among the technology companies expressing concern and USA Today (1/28, Guynn, Mandaro, 5.28M) describes the "shockwaves" as leading CEOs "denounced with the policy, which would affect their own employees working here legally, as well as their competitive quest for talent."

Bloomberg News (1/28, Bergen, Newcomer, 2.41M) reports Google CEO Sundar Pichai "slammed" Trump in a company-wide memo and Facebook Inc. CEO Mark Zuckerberg "voiced concern over the policy on Friday, and Airbnb Inc. CEO Brian Chesky said Saturday in a tweet that 'closing doors further divides' people." Uber Technologies Inc. CEO Travis Kalanick also pledged Saturday "to outline his misgivings about the order at the first meeting of the Trump administration's business advisory group next Friday in Washington." The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Lien, 4.52M) meanwhile highlights the reaction of other Silicon Valley entrepreneurs. On the CBS Weekend News (1/28, story 4, 1:55, Ninan), Carter Evans explained "the concern among some business leaders...is that if the tech companies can't bring in the best workers in the world, well then they just might move their operation to countries where those workers are allowed."

Airlines "Struggling To Comply" With Order, Complain About Lack Of Advance Notice. Bloomberg News (1/28, Sasso, Palmeri, 2.41M) reports "global airlines are struggling to comply with new travel restrictions after being caught flat-footed by" the order, as "US carriers didn't get advance notice of the travel ban or briefings from government officials on how it should be implemented, people familiar with the matter said."

Trump Put Mattis In "Uncomfortable" Position With Executive Order. The New York Times (1/28, Cooper, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports President Trump put Defense Secretary Mattis in an "uncomfortable" position on Friday when he signed the executive order "in a Pentagon room dedicated to men and women who have received the country's highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor." According to the Times, while Mattis "sharply criticized" Trump six months ago for a similar proposal, saying, "This kind of thing is causing us great damage right now, and it's sending shock waves through the international system," since joining the Administration he has had to decide "which battles to fight." The Times suggests Mattis "won a huge" victory getting Trump to agree not to reinstate torture, but he was "outflanked by the White House" on the President's release of the order at the Pentagon "a sharply divisive move in front of military leaders who view themselves as apolitical." The Times additionally notes the Defense Department's statement about Trump's visit "pointedly made no mention of the Muslim ban."

Administration Suspends "Iranian Lautenberg Program." The AP (1/28, Jahn, Caldwell) reports that while it "isn't directly linked to an executive order Trump signed Friday," the Administration has suspended the so-called "Iranian Lautenberg Program," a "27-year-old program originally approved by Congress to help Jews in the former Soviet Union," but had expanded to help "Iranian Jews, Christians and Baha'i, who were at risk in their home country and eligible to resettle in the United State."

State Department Removes Pages On Refugees From Website. The Hill (1/27, Seipel, 1.25M) notes in its "Briefing Room" blog that the State Department website has removed two pages "that chronicled the 'myths and facts' about refugees"

National Security Experts Challenge Efficacy Of Executive Order. The New York Times (1/28, A1, Shane, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) states on its front page that while the President's executive order has a "straightforward and laudable purpose," his "directive is unlikely to significantly reduce the terrorist threat in the United States, which has been a minuscule part of the overall toll of violence since 2001" and "many experts believe [its] unintended consequences will make the threat worse." In an article titled "Trump Redefines The Enemy And 15 Years Of Counterterrorism Policy," the Washington Post (1/28, Jaffe, 11.43M) describes "the net result of Trump's new approach" toward terrorism as "a vast departure for a country that has often struggled over the past 15 years to say whether it is at war and precisely who it is fighting." The Post adds that "for Trump and his senior policy advisers, America is locked in a world war for its very survival, and the enemies in this wide-ranging battle are not only radical Islamist terrorists but a chaotic, violent and angry Muslim world." The Post contrasts Trump's position with that of his predecessors, former Presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama, and notes National Security Adviser Flynn recently wrote in his book, "The Field of Fight," that the fight against al Qaeda and ISIS is a "world war" that "we could lose. ... In fact, right now we're losing."

In a front-page article, the Washington Post (1/28, A1, Fisher, 11.43M) examines the history of US immigration policy and suggests the President's order "harks back to a period when the US government regularly banned immigrants and refugees from countries whose people were considered inferior, dangerous or incompatible with American values." The Post highlights that "Trump's executive action marks the first time a president has sought to bar people because of their nation of origin – or their religion, as only Muslim-dominated countries are included in the order – since the 1965 Immigration and Nationality Act scrapped national-origin quotas," which David Bier, an immigration policy analyst at the Cato Institute's Center for Global Liberty and Prosperity, said amounts to "a paradigm shift" and "explicit rejection of the approach that George W. Bush and Barack Obama embraced, in which a big part of the war on terror was to bring in allies, to prove we're not waging a war on Islam and to show that we're an open society toward Muslims."

In a Washington Post (1/28, Hamid, 11.43M) piece, Shadi Hamid, a senior fellow in the Project on US Relations with the Islamic World at the Brookings Institution, concedes that while "the executive order may, in fact, be illegal," Trump's "decree, though, is just as frightening – perhaps even more so – for what it tells us about a young presidency and how the office intends to use its power in its flurry of seemingly manic energy and activity." Hamid asserts that the order "underscores the new administration's fixation on what it views not as a terrorist threat but a civilizational one in which the very act of being Muslim is grounds for scrutiny."

The AP (1/28, Tucker) cautions "it's not clear that these measures will help prevent attacks on American soil, and they could wind up emboldening extremists who already view the U.S. as at war with Islam," noting that the list of affected countries "does not include Saudi Arabia, where the majority of the Sept. 11 hijackers were from." The AP adds the restrictions also fail to "address a more urgent law enforcement concern: homegrown violent extremists already in the United States who plot their attacks without any overseas connections or contacts." The Huffington Post (1/28, Mathias, 237K) cites a recent Cato Institute analysis to emphasize "there have been zero fatal terror attacks on US soil since 1975 by immigrants from the seven Muslim-majority countries...targeted with immigration bans on Friday, further highlighting the needlessness and cruelty of the president's executive order."

Bloomberg News (1/28, Nasseri, Fattah, 2.41M) considers "what's at stake" from the order, concluding that one thing in common between the seven countries is that they have "little commerce" with the US, as "most of which are either at war or poor – or both." The Washington Post (1/28, Helderman, 11.43M) takes a more cynical look at the President's order, noting that "they are places he does not appear to have any business interests," as a number of countries "excluded from the lists are...majority Muslim nations where the Trump Organization is active and which in some cases have also faced troublesome issues with terrorism." The Post contends that "notable omissions" include Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, and "Indonesia, the world's largest majority-minority nation, where there are two large Trump-branded resorts underway, built in partnership with powerful local interests."

However, USA Today (1/28, Gomez, 5.28M) suggests the future of the order "may come down to a legal battle between his powers as commander in chief and discrimination limitations established by Congress." USA Today explains "the legality of Trump's order will not be clear until it's argued in federal court, which could happen as early as next week, when civil rights and immigration advocacy groups begin filing their lawsuits." Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, suggested the courts will uphold their "extraordinary latitude" of the executive branch "in making determinations associated with national security," but other lawyers cited "the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, which forbids discrimination against immigrants based on their 'nationality, place of birth, or place of residence.'"

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (1/28, Kessler, 11.43M) "Fact Checker" also gives the President "Two Pinocchios" because he "goes too far to claim that it is 'very tough' for Syrian Christians to become refugees in the United States, and that they have been 'horribly treated.'" The Post admits he "is correct that a relatively small percentage of Syrian refugees have been admitted," the article concludes "the Iraqi experience is exactly the opposite, even though the same U.N. agency is handling the refugee requests. The basic fact is no one understands why there is such a disparity. The president could highlight that situation without suggesting that something nefarious is going on."

Researchers Warn "Far-Right Media" Responsible For Fear Of Refugees. The New York Times (1/28, Dickerson, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) blames "far-right media" and "ultraconservative websites like Breitbart News and Infowars" that have in recent months "published a cycle of eye-popping stories with misleading claims about refugees. And it is beginning to influence public perception, experts

NYTimes, WPost, Columnists Denounce Trump's Executive Order. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/28, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) denounces President Trump's executive order, calling the measure an act of "cruelty" as well as a "bigoted, cowardly, self-defeating policy." The Times also laments the suffering of the refugees affected by the ban, which "makes clear that the xenophobia and Islamophobia that permeated Mr. Trump's campaign are to stain his presidency as well."

The Washington Post (1/28, 11.43M) editorializes that the President's action "is an affront to values upon which the nation was founded and that have made it a beacon of hope around the world." According to the Post, Trump "has slammed the door on the oppressed and persecuted in a fit of irrational xenophobia."

In his New York Times (1/28, Bruni, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) column, Frank Bruni says that after a week of the Trump Administration, he is "heartsick about America, whose most fundamental values and claim to moral leadership are at stake." In his New York Times (1/28, Kristof, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) column, Nicholas Kristof condemns the "xenophobic fearmongering that President Trump is now trying to make American policy." He implores the President to "please remember: This is a country built by refugees and immigrants, your ancestors and mine. When we bar them and vilify them, we shame our own roots."

TEXAS BUSINESS LEADERS, OFFICIALS MEET TO DISCUSS TRUMP'S ORDER ON WALL, NAFTA. The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Frosch, Althaus, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports a group of 45 Texas business leaders and public officials, including port officials and bankers, on Friday met in Laredo to discuss ways to approach the Trump Administration on border security and trade. The Journal says that of concern to business leaders has been the renegotiation of the North American Free Trade Agreement, which has benefited towns like Laredo, Texas, even if it has wrecked manufacturing towns in parts of the country. While coming out in support of the wall, the article says many in the meeting expressed surprise and concern over Trumps stance on NAFTA.

TRUMP'S WALL "WILL BE A BOON FOR CONTRACTORS." The New York Times (1/28, Ivory, Creswell, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump's ambitions to build a border wall, the details of which still remain fuzzy, "will be a boon for contractors." The article examines prior efforts to build a wall, with Boeing and other companies winning a federal contract in 2006 to do so, but "throwing in the towel" after five years and $1 billion spent. The Times says the project has "already caught the eye of companies and investors eager to get a piece of the construction action, despite the myriad political and social battles that will surround it."

MIAMI MAYORS BLAST GIMENEZ FOR ENDING "SANCTUARY CITY" STATUS. The Miami Herald (1/28, Mazzei, 856K) reports Miami-Dade Mayor Carlos Gimenez has come under fire from the current and former mayor of the city of Miami, one a Republican and one a Democrat, for "directing county jails to comply with federal immigration detention requests following President Donald Trump's crackdown on "sanctuary" jurisdictions." On Friday night, Mayor Tomás Regalado tweeted, "@MiamiPD job is to protect and serve the residents of the @CityofMiami. ...I am disappointed with the decision of the County." The Herald says both Regalado and Gimenez have been at odds for years.

SOURCES SAY TRUMP AIDES DIVIDED OVER DACA. Reuters (1/28, Ainsley, Cowan) reports President Trump's advisers are divided over whether to rescind the DACA program, "according to congressional sources and Republicans close to the White House." Reuters says "a more moderate factor" lead by White House Chief of Staff Priebus is at odds with "immigration hardliners Stephen Miller and Steve Bannon." Miller and Bannon have "pushed Trump to take a harder approach and rescind the protections," even as Priebus has publicly stated "Trump will work with Congress to get a 'long-term solution' on the issue."

Terrorism Investigations:

TRUMP SIGNS EXECUTIVE ORDER EXPEDITING CONFLICT AGAINST ISIS. The Washington Post (1/28, Rucker, Ryan, 11.43M) reports President Trump issued a directive order to the Joint Chiefs on Saturday, in which he established a 30-day deadline to submit a strategy to defeat ISIS. The measure highlights Trump's commitment to combating global terrorism more aggressively than former President Obama, as Trump pledged during the campaign. On condition of anonymity, a defense official said the extent of the Administration's campaign "would depend upon the political risk that the president is willing to take when we do certain things that could exacerbate things with Russia or Turkey or the PMF," or the Iranian-backed militias in Iraq. The official added that new proposals will ensure battlefield commanders "have the wherewithal and the leeway to do what they have to do to successfully prosecute the campaign."

Reuters (1/28, Stewart) says Trump predicted that the executive order is "going to be very successful. That's big stuff." Defense Secretary Mattis has rallied for a more forceful approach to ISIS, but the implementation of that goals is not yet clear. Furthermore, military officials "have long acknowledged" that the US "could more quickly defeat" the group by committing its own troops instead of using local fighters, but the measure is not likely to garner much support, would likely result in more American lives lost, and would not likely secure a long-term solution. Reuters adds that the Administration has yet to decide "whether to directly provide weapons to Kurdish fighters in Syria as they push toward Raqqa, despite fierce objections from NATO ally Turkey." On Friday, Trump met with military officials at the Pentagon for about an hour, during which they discussed not only how to defeat ISIS, but also "other hot-button issues, including the threat from North Korea."

NYTIMES EXAMINES FBI "SHADOWY" EFFORTS TO IDENTIFY ISLAMIC EXTREMISTS. The New York Times (1/28, Lichtblau, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) examines the prosecution of veteran Washington transit officer Nick Young for helping ISIS, as a review "offers a revealing look at the FBI's shadowy cat-and-mouse efforts to identify possible Islamic extremists." The Times cautions that his case also "poses a challenge to the FBI's expanding use of undercover operations to identify Islamic State sympathizers inside the United States." Young, the article says, was charged with provided the ISIS with "material support" by giving $245 in Google Play gift cards to a Muslim friend named Mo, who was "in reality, an undercover informant," to support recruitment efforts. His lawyers, however, argue the FBI has "entrapped him, with undercover operatives popping in and out of his life for at least six years."

UNCONFIRMED REPORTS CLAIM US RAID KILLS THREE AL QAEDA MILITANTS IN YEMEN. Residents in the rural southern Yemen district of Yakla told Reuters (1/29, Browning) that an early Sunday helicopter raid killed several people, including the senior leader of al Qaeda's branch in Yemen, Abdulraoof al-Dhahab, and two of his brothers. The helicopter commandos are believed to be US soldiers; if confirmed, the incident would mark America's first military raid in Yemen since the nation's civil war erupted almost two years ago, and the first under the new Administration.

Cyber News:

HACKERS INFECTED DC POLICE CLOSED-CIRCUIT CAMERA NETWORK PRIOR TO INAUGURATION. The Washington Post (1/27, Williams, 11.43M) reports that 70 percent of the DC Police's storage devices, which are used to record data from surveillance cameras, were hacked eight days before the presidential inauguration, which required a "major citywide reinstallation effort," according to officials with the police department and city technology's office. Accordingly, the "cyberattack affected 123 of 187 network video recorders in a closed-circuit TV system for public spaces across the city," which "left police cameras unable to record between Jan. 12 and Jan. 15." Secret Service officer Brian Ebert, however, indicated "the safety of the public or protectees was never jeopardized."

GEOGRAPHY NO LONGER DEFENSE FOR US AGAINST CYBERTHREATS. The AP (1/28, Abdollah) reports that the US has "long relied on its borders and superior military might" to protect itself against "foreign aggressors," but that there are no such boundaries or rulebooks in cyberspace, which "has increased the threat and leveled the playing field today." The article says that it's not clear how President

Trump “will respond to cyberspace threats, which transcend traditional borders and make it easier and cheaper than ever for foreigners to attack the US.” However, the approach Trump does take, the AP states, “will set the tone and precedent for global policies during a critical time when the ground rules are still being written.”

National Security News:

TRUMP SIGNS EXECUTIVE ORDER TO RESTRUCTURE NSC. The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Lee, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that on Saturday, President Trump signed an executive order that called for the restructuring and streamlining of the National Security Council to ensure it is better equipped to handle cyber, digital, and terrorist threats. A White House official explained the goal of the order was to make NSC “more adaptive to the modern threats that we face.”

TRUMP LAUNCHES GLOBAL DEMOCRACY EFFORTS WITHOUT “SEASONED SUPPORT.” Politico (1/28, Crowley, 2.46M) reports President Trump is “pushing ahead with a global democracy” without a confirmed Secretary of State and with “relatively little guidance from seasoned diplomatic advisers.” Trump scheduled a series of phone calls with foreign leaders “despite the continued gaps” in his diplomatic team, Politico says, noting that National Security Adviser Flynn “has no traditional diplomatic experience,” and calling the State Department “a work in progress” where “confusion lingers” in some of its “key parts.” Furthermore, Secretary of State-designate Rex Tillerson is not expected to be confirmed until at least Monday. Politico says Trump’s approach mirrors his campaign style but “contrasts with the one adopted by President Obama.” Trump’s “lack of seasoned support” did not, however, prevent him “from pulling off a seemingly smooth meeting with” British Prime Minister Theresa May.

ADMINISTRATION DELAYS ISSUANCE OF UN FUNDING, MULTILATERAL TREATY DRAFT ORDERS. The New York Times (1/28, Fisher, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports an executive order to reduce the US’ funding of the United Nations and another aimed at reviewing and possibly canceling certain multilateral treaties have been delayed, according to current and former US officials briefed on the issue. The Administration submitted both draft orders to the National Security Council but offered the NSC’s advisers less than an hour and a half to review them. Some officials “balked” at the draft orders’ content and warned that they necessitated legal vetting. The draft orders will remain withheld until the State Department and other agencies can conduct a more complete review of the orders’ content.

TRUMP, PUTIN DISCUSS FIGHT AGAINST ISIS, REPAIRING US-RUSSIAN RELATIONS. Bloomberg Politics (1/28, Rudnitsky, 201K) reports that in President Trump’s first formal phone call to Russian President Vladimir Putin, both Trump and Putin agreed to cooperate against ISIS and reverse bilateral tensions. Vice President Pence, senior counselor Stephen Bannon, National Security Adviser Flynn, White House Chief of Staff Priebus, and press secretary Sean Spicer also participated in the phone call. In a statement, the White House commented, “The positive call was a significant start to improving the relationship between the United States and Russia that is in need of repair.” The Kremlin described the phone call as “positive and businesslike” and said “both sides demonstrated a desire for active joint efforts to stabilize and develop Russia-American relations on a constructive, equitable and mutually beneficial basis.” In their statements, neither the White House nor the Kremlin mentioned the US’ sanctions against Russia.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Razumovskaya, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) notes Russia and the past Administration disagreed over the Syrian conflict, with Russia backing Syrian President Bashar al-Assad and former President Obama backing Assad’s removal. The Journal suggests the statements from the White House and the Kremlin indicated that Trump could more closely align with Russia in Syria against ISIS and other militant groups.

The Washington Post (1/28, Rucker, Filipov, 11.43M) reports Russian Security Council head Nikolai Patrushev praised the two leaders’ first official discussion and commented, “We will await the results, but I believe everything will be positive.” Prior to Saturday’s phone call, the Kremlin cautioned against “excessive optimism” over Trump’s presidency and what it will mean for Russia. On Friday, Putin’s spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, told reporters, “One can hardly expect substantive contacts on the entire range of affairs from this call,” and recommended, “Let us wait and see. Let us be patient.” The Post adds that from Russia’s perspective, “lifting the sanctions imposed by the Obama administration for interference in the presidential election and Russia’s intervention in Ukraine would be a good start” to improved US-Russian relations, and, “On a grander scale, the Kremlin seems to hope the Trump administration will relax” and allow Putin’s Russia to “have greater influence in world affairs.”

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Parsons, Wilkinson, 4.52M) predicts that Trump’s emerging relationship with Putin will likely be among “the most closely watched of his administration, both at home and around the world.” European leaders and US lawmakers have been “alarmed” by Trump’s “praise and unusually friendly overtures toward the Russian leader,” and their concerns were “further cemented” by the ties to Russia that Secretary of State-designate Rex Tillerson “has acknowledged.” Trump’s supporters, however, have maintained that Trump’s “outreach toward Russia was intended to curb Putin’s aggressive behavior.”

TRUMP, MERKEL DISCUSS NATO IN PHONE CONVERSATION. The AP (1/28, Jordans) reports President Trump spoke with German Chancellor Angela Merkel by telephone on Saturday. According to Merkel’s spokesman, Steffen Seibert, the two leaders “expressed their intention to further deepen the already excellent bilateral relations in the coming years,” and agreed on the “fundamental importance that the NATO alliance has for trans-Atlantic relations.” Seibert also claimed Trump accepted Merkel’s invitation to the G-20 meeting in July, which Germany is hosting, and Trump said he looked forward to Merkel’s visit to Washington “soon.”

Reuters (1/28, Shalal) reports the two leaders also discussed the situation in North Africa and the Middle East, their nations’ ties to Russia, the eastern Ukrainian conflict, and NATO. In a joint statement, Trump and Merkel wrote that they “recognized that NATO must be capable of confronting 21st century threats and that our common defense requires appropriate investment in military capabilities to ensure all allies are contributing their fair share to our collective security.” The statement did not indicate whether the two leaders discussed Trump’s recent executive order restricting immigration or efforts to cancel free-trade agreements, both of which German officials have criticized.

TRUMP, ABE PLAN FOR MEETING, DISCUSS ECONOMIC AND SECURITY ISSUES. The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Nakamichi, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports President Trump and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe discussed “the importance” of a mutual alliance in “areas such as the economy and national security” in a Saturday telephone call, according to Abe in remarks after the conversation. Abe said he and Trump also agreed to meet on Feb. 10 in Washington for another “frank, meaningful exchange of opinions.”

In their upcoming meeting, Trump and Abe will focus on “affirming the importance of bilateral ties while setting the stage for potentially sensitive trade talks,” Reuters (1/28, Takenaka, Rampton) reports. During the telephone conversation, Abe and Trump discussed the automotive industry, according to Japanese senior government spokesman Koichi Hagiuda, and the importance of US-Japanese economic ties. In a statement, the White House also noted, “President Trump and Prime Minister Abe said they would consult and cooperate on the threat posed by North Korea.”

The White House also commented, “President Trump affirmed the ironclad U.S. commitment to ensuring the security of Japan,” and both Trump and Abe “also committed to deepen the bilateral trade and investment relationship,” Reuters (1/28, Rampton, Wroughton) reports in a second article. The White House also confirmed that the two leaders discussed Defense Secretary Mattis’ upcoming visit to Japan.

TRUMP HOLDS PHONE CALL WITH AUSTRALIAN PRIME MINISTER. An Australian government official, on condition of anonymity, told Bloomberg News (1/29, Johnson, 2.41M) that in a 25-minute phone conversation with Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull on Saturday, President Trump pledged to uphold the US’ commitment under former President Obama to potentially resettle about 1,600 asylum seekers. The asylum seekers are currently detained in camps on Manus Island and Nauru. The agreement “appeared in jeopardy” on Friday, when Trump issued an executive order to temporarily prohibit refugees from entering the US. In a statement, the White House did not mention the refugee agreement but said Trump and Turnbull "emphasized the enduring strength and closeness of the US-Australia relationship that is critical for peace, stability, and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific region and globally."

JEWISH LEADERS DENOUNCE NETANYAHU'S PRAISE OF PROPOSED MEXICAN BORDER WALL. Reuters (1/28, Graham) reports Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised President Trump's proposed Mexican border wall on Saturday and, on his official Twitter account, explained, "President Trump is right. I built a wall along Israel's southern border. It stopped all illegal immigration. Great success. Great idea." Mexico's Jewish community "swiftly rejected" Netanyahu's remark, including the nation's Foreign Ministry, which expressed "profound astonishment, rejection and disappointment." The ministry added that its Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray reiterated Mexico's deep affection for Israel on Friday, which is recognized as a Holocaust memorial day.

The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Jones, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says that Mexico's Jewish community also issued statement that read, "As Mexicans and Jews we support the actions taken by President Enrique Peña Nieto in negotiations with the U.S.," and former US ambassador to Israel, Daniel Shapiro, remarked, "Hard to explain this intervention on a hotly debated issue." Israel's ambassador to Mexico, Jonathan Peled, attempted to clarify Netanyahu's comment and stated that he was "referring to our experience in security that we want to share, it does not express a position on the U.S.-Mexican relationship."

Israeli Settlement Residents Express Optimism About Administration. The Washington Post (1/29, Morris, Eglash, 11.43M) reports some of President Trump's close associates have ties to a "right-wing Zionist community" of a Beit El settlement in the occupied West Bank. The US' ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, is president of American Friends of Bet El Institutions, which raises about $2 million annually to protect the community. White House senior adviser Jared Kushner has contributed "tens of thousands" to the organization, and "Trump himself made a $10,000 donation in 2003, his foundation's tax filings show." Settlement residents expressed optimism about the settlement's future and about Friedman's appointment, but one resident, Hillel Manne, commented that "if you want change you'll need big change at the State Department." Hanan Ashrawi of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, however, called upcoming settlement expansion plans "disastrous."

Rice Criticizes Trump's Statement On International Holocaust Remembrance Day. The Hill (1/28, Vladimirov, 1.25M) reports former National Security Adviser Susan Rice published a Twitter message on Saturday in which she chastised President Trump for issuing a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day but failed to recognize Jewish victims. "What sickness enables a statement on [Holocaust Memorial Day] that ignores 6 million Jews! Just imagine the response if Pres. Obama did that," Rice wrote. Specifically, Rice objected to Trump's use of the phrase "innocent people" on grounds that the phrase did not adequately reflect the genocide committed against Jews.

TRUMP, MAY DISPLAY "SPECIAL RELATIONSHIP" DESPITE CRITICISMS. A source on British Prime Minister Theresa May's team told Reuters (1/28, Piper) that May and President Trump engaged in a "warm, free-flowing and unscripted" conversation on Friday during lunch to reiterate the "special relationship" between the US and UK. The source revealed, "They talked a lot about Thatcher and Reagan, and both agreed it was one of the most successful political relationships ever," and that "Trump went on to say that he always looked up to Reagan and said that he wanted their relationship to be even better than that one." The source said Trump and May also discussed Russia, Brexit, and the NATO alliance.

The AP (1/28, Lawless) similarly says May and Trump's friendship was evidenced by "front-page photos of the two leaders touching hands as they walked at the White House before a strikingly collegial news conference." The two leaders' mutual affection was seemingly resistant to their starkly different positions on a variety of matters. May's office described Trump's offer of his hand as a chivalrous gesture and confirmed that the two leaders' conversation flowed easily. May's apparent rapport with Trump is "delighting those who think Trump's presidency will be good for Britain but alarming others who loathe the brash Republican populist." Britain's Labour Party leader Jeremy Corbyn accused May for having "failed to challenge Trump and stand up for our values," and Liberal Democrat leader Tim Farron said she “clearly spent her time with Trump dodging his despicable comments on torture, on women, on Muslims and on Mexicans.”

Bloomberg Politics (1/29, Hutton, 201K) says that the two leaders’ amicability failed to resonate in Britain, and “May’s refusal to publicly disagree with” Trump on his executive order limiting immigration “unleashed a flood of criticism,” especially from her Conservative Party colleagues. In Turkey, where May traveled to after departing the US, she “was asked three times what she thought of the ban, and three times she ignored the question.” May finally responded to heckling journalists, saying, “The United States is responsible for the United States’ own policy on refugees.”

NYPost Praises “Special Relationship” Between Trump, May. In an editorial, the New York Post (1/28, 3.82M) praises President Trump and British Prime Minister Theresa May for establishing their “special relationship” and adds that the US and Britain “seem to be in step again — as in the days of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, or Bill Clinton and Tony Blair.” The Post points to “Trump’s remarkable Election Day win” and Britons’ vote to leave the European Union, which prompted May’s predecessor, David Cameron, to resign, as “twin populist surprises” to which the two leaders “owe their offices.” The Post concludes, “For the new president’s first face-to-face with a fellow world leader, it couldn’t have gone better.”

HOLLANDE URGES TRUMP, EUROPEAN LEADERS TO REJECT POPULISM. Reuters (1/28, Rose) reports French President Francois Hollande, in a Saturday phone call, urged President Trump to resist adopting a protectionist approach because of the economic and political ramifications of “turning inward.” Hollande also reiterated his country’s commitment to the UN, the indispensable value of NATO, and importance of keeping the EU intact.

Before reporters, Hollande urged EU members to unite against the threat of populist movement and accused the US of encouraging “populism and even extremism,” the AP (1/28, Hatton) reports. He accused the US of “saying that Europe should not take immigrants, shouldn’t stay together, not believe in climate change,” and called on bloc leaders to “engage in discussions (with the U.S.) that sometimes should be very firm.” Hollande asserted that “as long as there are statements from the U.S. president about Europe, when he speaks about the model of Brexit for other countries, when the U.S. president talks about climate change...saying he’s not convinced of it, we should respond to him. When he takes protectionist measures, we should respond to him. When he destabilizes the economies of other countries, not only European ones, we should respond to him. When he rejects the arrival of refugees, while Europe has done its duty, we should respond to him.”

JORDANIAN KING TO VISIT US ON MONDAY. The Wall Street Journal (1/28, Paletta, Nicholas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports King Abdullah II of Jordan will visit Washington, DC on Monday, although it is unclear whether he will meet with President Trump. A statement from King Abdullah II’s office claimed he will meet with members of Congress and other US officials; King Abdullah II’s visit may be the first visit from an Arab leader since Trump issued an executive order limiting the US’ refugee program and blocking the entry of people from various Muslim nations.

EUROPE’S FUTURE EXPECTED TO HINGE ON RESOLUTIONS OF KEY UNCERTAINTIES. The New York Times (1/28, Gladstone, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) highlights the uncertainties that face Europe in 2017, such as “terrorism, borders, migration, economics and President Trump’s new America First message booming from across the Atlantic.” The Times profiles Britain’s exit from the European Union, Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan’s potential withdrawal of Turkey’s bloc membership application, and the economic troubles in Greece and Italy as key issues. The Times also points to Trump’s uncertain position on US-Russian relations and NATO as well as his possible impact on key European elections this year.

DISPUTE OVER KINGS OF MALTA REFLECTS DEEP DIVISIONS IN THE VATICAN. On its front page, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Horowitz, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports the medieval Roman Catholic order known as the Kings of Malta agreed on Saturday to Pope Francis’ demand to replace its leader with a papal delegate. The “intra-Catholic squabble” erupted into “a full-scale proxy war between Pope Francis and the Vatican traditionalists who oppose him,” however, when the conservatives denounced Francis' order as "an illegal annexation and ideological purging by a power-obsessed pontiff." The conflict, says the Times, indicates that the Vatican is not immune to the "political tensions rippling across the globe."

JAPAN ADDRESSES GROWING AGING POPULATION. In a front-page article, the Washington Post (1/28, A1, Fifield, 11.43M) reports more than a quarter of Japan's population is over the age of 65, and that figure is expected to reach 40 percent by 2050. The nation's birthrate, however, is well below the level required to maintain its current population of 128 million. The Japanese government is preemptively addressing anticipated elderly care labor shortages and exploring how to keep the rising number of seniors healthy and active. In one measure, to be implemented next year, the government will loosen elderly caregiver licensing regulations and establish a technical intern program.

WPOST DENOUNCES RUSSIA'S DECRIMINALIZATION OF DOMESTIC BATTERY. In an editorial about Russia's lower parliamentary house, the State Duma, vote Friday to approve the decriminalization of domestic battery for first-time offenders, the Washington Post (1/28, 11.43M) calls the move "wrong-headed" and says it "sends a message that brutality in a family is legitimate." The Post contends that the "most objectionable" aspect of the measure "is the broader message it sends: that a domestic assault that doesn't break bones or result in a concussion" should not be penalized, even if the assault results in humiliation or deeply damages the victim emotionally.

KABUL CITIZENS AWAIT OUTCOME OF ALLEGATIONS AGAINST AFGHANISTAN'S VICE PRESIDENT. The Washington Post (1/28, Constable, 11.43M) reports that residents in Afghanistan's capital, Kabul, are questioning whether police units intend to arrest "rogue vice president" Abdurrashid Dostum, the ethnic Uzbek leader and former warlord accused of kidnapping and sexually assaulting his political rival, Ahmad Eschi. The allegations against Dostum have thrust President Ashraf Ghani's government "into a tense predicament." Western governments and human rights organizations have urged Ghani to take legal action against Dostum, but some influential officials warned that such action could prompt an armed uprising on behalf of Dostum's followers.

FORMER WARLORD TO RETURN TO AFGHANISTAN WITHIN WEEKS. The AP (1/29, Gannon) reports Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a former warlord and "the only insurgent leader to sign a peace pact with Afghanistan's government," plans to "return to the country within weeks, his chief negotiator says, in a move that could shake up Afghan politics and complicate the much wider war against the Taliban." The AP notes Hekmatyar is on the UN and US Treasury's "lists of wanted terrorists" and his spokesman "declined to say whether Hekmatyar would return to Afghanistan without first being removed from the lists, and there has been no indication that the U.N. or Washington is considering his removal."

AFGHAN GOVERNMENT STRUGGLES TO RESOLVE TALIBAN'S INCOME DIVERSIFICATION EFFORTS. The New York Times (1/28, Mashal, Rahim, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Taliban militants in Afghanistan have routinely collected utility bills from residents in Helmand and in Kunduz. Afghanistan's government provides the electricity, often from neighboring countries, but if it terminates power then it risks further angering the already-disenchanted populations. According to the UN, the utility payment seizures are the Taliban's latest efforts to diversify their income streams, which also include crop levies and narcotics.

Full Executive Order Text: Trump's Action Limiting Refugees Into The U.S.

New York Times, January 27, 2017

President Trump signed an executive order on Friday titled "Protecting the Nation From Foreign Terrorist Entry Into the United States." Following is the language of that order, as supplied by the White House.

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, including the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA), 8 U.S.C. 1101 et seq., and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, and to protect the American people from terrorist attacks by foreign nationals admitted to the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Purpose. The visa-issuance process plays a crucial role in detecting individuals with terrorist ties and stopping them from entering the United States. Perhaps in no instance was that more apparent than the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, when State Department policy prevented consular officers from properly scrutinizing the visa applications of several of the 19 foreign nationals who went on to murder nearly 3,000 Americans. And while the visa-issuance process was reviewed and amended after the September 11 attacks to better detect would-be terrorists from receiving visas, these measures did not stop attacks by foreign nationals who were admitted to the United States.

Numerous foreign-born individuals have been convicted or implicated in terrorism-related crimes since September 11, 2001, including foreign nationals who entered the United States after receiving visitor, student, or employment visas, or who entered through the United States refugee resettlement program. Deteriorating conditions in certain countries due to war, strife, disaster, and civil unrest increase the likelihood that terrorists will use any means possible to enter the United States. The United States must be vigilant during the visa-issuance process to ensure that those approved for admission do not intend to harm Americans and that they have no ties to terrorism.

In order to protect Americans, the United States must ensure that those admitted to this country do not bear hostile attitudes toward it and its founding principles. The United States cannot, and should not, admit those who do not support the Constitution, or those who would place violent ideologies over American law. In addition, the United States should not admit those who engage in acts of bigotry or hatred (including "honor" killings, other forms of violence against women, or the persecution of those who practice religions different from their own) or those who would oppress Americans of any race, gender, or sexual orientation.

Sec. 2. Policy. It is the policy of the United States to protect its citizens from foreign nationals who intend to commit terrorist attacks in the United States; and to prevent the admission of foreign nationals who intend to exploit United States immigration laws for malevolent purposes.

Sec. 3. Suspension of Issuance of Visas and Other Immigration Benefits to Nationals of Countries of Particular Concern. (a) The Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Director of National Intelligence, shall immediately conduct a review to determine the information needed from any country to adjudicate any visa, admission, or other benefit under the INA (adjudications) in order to determine that the individual seeking the benefit is who the individual claims to be and is not a security or public-safety threat.

(b) The Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Director of National Intelligence, shall submit to the President a report on the results of the review described in subsection (a) of this section, including the Secretary of Homeland Security's determination of the information needed for adjudications and a list of countries that do not provide adequate information, within 30 days of the date of this order. The Secretary of Homeland Security shall provide a copy of the report to the Secretary of State and the Director of National Intelligence.

(c) To temporarily reduce investigative burdens on relevant agencies during the review period described in subsection (a) of this section, to ensure the proper review and maximum utilization of available resources for the screening of foreign nationals, and to ensure that adequate standards are established to prevent infiltration by foreign terrorists or criminals, pursuant to section 212(f) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), I hereby proclaim that the immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of aliens from countries referred to in section 217(a)(12) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1187(a)(12), would be detrimental to the interests of the United States, and I hereby suspend entry into the United States, as immigrants and nonimmigrants, of such persons for 90 days from the date of this order (excluding those foreign nationals traveling on diplomatic visas, North Atlantic Treaty Organization visas, C-2 visas for travel to the United Nations, and G-1, G-2, G-3, and G-4 visas).

(d) Immediately upon receipt of the report described in subsection (b) of this section regarding the information needed for adjudications, the Secretary of State shall request all foreign governments that do not supply such information to start providing such information regarding their nationals within 60 days of notification.

(e) After the 60-day period described in subsection (d) of this section expires, the Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Secretary of State, shall submit to the President a list of countries recommended for inclusion on a Presidential proclamation that would prohibit the entry of foreign nationals (excluding those foreign nationals traveling on diplomatic visas, North Atlantic Treaty Organization visas, C-2 visas for travel to the United Nations, and G-1, G-2, G-3, and G-4 visas) from countries that do not provide the information requested pursuant to subsection (d) of this section until compliance occurs.

(f) At any point after submitting the list described in subsection (e) of this section, the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Homeland Security may submit to the President the names of any additional countries recommended for similar treatment.

(g) Notwithstanding a suspension pursuant to subsection (c) of this section or pursuant to a Presidential proclamation described in subsection (e) of this section, the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security may, on a case-by-case basis, and when in the national interest, issue visas or other immigration benefits to nationals of countries for which visas and benefits are otherwise blocked.

(h) The Secretaries of State and Homeland Security shall submit to the President a joint report on the progress in implementing this orderwithin 30 days of the date of this order, a second report within 60 daysof the date of this order, a third report within 90 days of the date of this order, and a fourth report within 120 days of the date of this order.

Sec. 4. Implementing Uniform Screening Standards for All Immigration Programs. (a) The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Director of National Intelligence, and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall implement a program, as part of the adjudication process for immigration benefits, to identify individuals seeking to enter the United States on a fraudulent basis with the intent to cause harm, or who are at risk of causing harm subsequent to their admission. This program will include the development of a uniform screening standard and procedure, such as in-person interviews; a database of identity documents proffered by applicants to ensure that duplicate documents are not used by multiple applicants; amended application forms that include questions aimed at identifying fraudulent answers and malicious intent; a mechanism to ensure that the applicant is who the applicant claims to be; a process to evaluate the applicant's likelihood of becoming a positively contributing member of society and the applicant's ability to make contributions to the national interest; and a mechanism to assess whether or not the applicant has the intent to commit criminal or terrorist acts after entering the United States.

(b) The Secretary of Homeland Security, in conjunction with the Secretary of State, the Director of National Intelligence, and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, shall submit to the President an initial report on the progress of this directive within 60 days of the date of this order, a second report within 100 days of the date of this order, and a third report within 200 days of the date of this order.

Sec. 5. Realignment of the U.S. Refugee Admissions Program for Fiscal Year 2017. (a) The Secretary of State shall suspend the U.S. Refugee Admissions Program (USRAP) for 120 days. During the 120-day period, the Secretary of State, in conjunction with the Secretary of Homeland Security and in consultation with the Director of National Intelligence, shall review the USRAP application and adjudication process to determine what additional procedures should be taken to ensure that those approved for refugee admission do not pose a threat to the security and welfare of the United States, and shall implement such additional procedures. Refugee applicants who are already in the USRAP process may be admitted upon the initiation and completion of these revised procedures. Upon the date that is 120 days after the date of this order, the Secretary of State shall resume USRAP admissions only for nationals of countries for which the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Homeland Security, and the Director of National Intelligence have jointly determined that such additional procedures are adequate to ensure the security and welfare of the United States.

(b) Upon the resumption of USRAP admissions, the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, is further directed to make changes, to the extent permitted by law, to prioritize refugee claims made by individuals on the basis of religious-based persecution, provided that the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country of nationality. Where necessary and appropriate, the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security shall recommend legislation to the President that would assist with such prioritization.

(c) Pursuant to section 212(f) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), I hereby proclaim that the entry of nationals of Syria as refugees is detrimental to the interests of the United States and thus suspend any such entry until such time as I have determined that sufficient changes have been made to the USRAP to ensure that admission of Syrian refugees is consistent with the national interest.

(d) Pursuant to section 212(f) of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), I hereby proclaim that the entry of more than 50,000 refugees in fiscal year 2017 would be detrimental to the interests of the United States, and thus suspend any such entry until such time as I determine that additional admissions would be in the national interest.

(e) Notwithstanding the temporary suspension imposed pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security may jointly determine to admit individuals to the United States as refugees on a case-by-case basis, in their discretion, but only so long as they determine that the admission of such individuals as refugees is in the national interest — including when the person is a religious minority in his country of nationality facing religious persecution, when admitting the person would enable the United States to conform its conduct to a preexisting international agreement, or when the person is already in transit and denying admission would cause undue hardship — and it would not pose a risk to the security or welfare of the United States.

(f) The Secretary of State shall submit to the President an initial report on the progress of the directive in subsection (b) of this section regarding prioritization of claims made by individuals on the basis of religious-based persecution within 100 days of the date of this order and shall submit a second report within 200 days of the date of this order.

(g) It is the policy of the executive branch that, to the extent permitted by law and as practicable, State and local jurisdictions be granted a role in the process of determining the placement or settlement in their jurisdictions of aliens eligible to be admitted to the United States as refugees. To that end, the Secretary of Homeland Security shall examine existing law to determine the extent to which, consistent with applicable law, State and local jurisdictions may have greater involvement in the process of determining the placement or resettlement of refugees in their jurisdictions, and shall devise a proposal to lawfully promote such involvement.

Sec. 6. Rescission of Exercise of Authority Relating to the Terrorism Grounds of Inadmissibility. The Secretaries of State and Homeland Security shall, in consultation with the Attorney General, consider rescinding the exercises of authority in section 212 of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1182, relating to the terrorism grounds of inadmissibility, as well as any related implementing memoranda.

Sec. 7. Expedited Completion of the Biometric Entry-Exit Tracking System. (a) The Secretary of Homeland Security shall expedite the completion and implementation of a biometric entry-exit tracking system for all travelers to the United States, as recommended by the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

(b) The Secretary of Homeland Security shall submit to the President periodic reports on the progress of the directive contained in subsection (a) of this section. The initial report shall be submitted within 100 days of the date of this order, a second report shall be submitted within 200 days of the date of this order, and a third report shall be submitted within 365 days of the date of this order. Further, the Secretary shall submit a report every 180 days thereafter until the system is fully deployed and operational.

Sec. 8. Visa Interview Security. (a) The Secretary of State shall immediately suspend the Visa Interview Waiver Program and ensure compliance with section 222 of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1222, which requires that all individuals seeking a nonimmigrant visa undergo an in-person interview, subject to specific statutory exceptions.

(b) To the extent permitted by law and subject to the availability of appropriations, the Secretary of State shall immediately expand the Consular Fellows Program, including by substantially increasing the number of Fellows, lengthening or making permanent the period of service, and making language training at the Foreign Service Institute available to Fellows for assignment to posts outside of their area of core linguistic ability, to ensure that non-immigrant visa-interview wait times are not unduly affected.

Sec. 9. Visa Validity Reciprocity. The Secretary of State shall review all nonimmigrant visa reciprocity agreements to ensure that they are, with respect to each visa classification, truly reciprocal insofar as practicable with respect to validity period and fees, as required by sections 221(c) and 281 of the INA, 8 U.S.C. 1201(c) and 1351, and other treatment. If a country does not treat United States nationals seeking nonimmigrant visas in a reciprocal manner, the Secretary of State shall adjust the visa validity period, fee schedule, or other treatment to match the treatment of United States nationals by the foreign country, to the extent practicable.

Sec. 10. Transparency and Data Collection. (a) To be more transparent with the American people, and to more effectively implement policies and practices that serve the national interest, the Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Attorney General, shall, consistent with applicable law and national security, collect and make publicly available within 180 days, and every 180 days thereafter:

(i) information regarding the number of foreign nationals in the United States who have been charged with terrorism-related offenses while in the United States; convicted of terrorism-related offenses while in the United States; or removed from the United States based on terrorism-related activity, affiliation, or material support to a terrorism-related organization, or any other national security reasons since the date of this order or the last reporting period, whichever is later;

(ii) information regarding the number of foreign nationals in the United States who have been radicalized after entry into the United States and engaged in terrorism-related acts, or who have provided material support to terrorism-related organizations in countries that pose a threat to the United States, since the date of this order or the last reporting period, whichever is later; and

(iii) information regarding the number and types of acts of gender-based violence against women, including honor killings, in the United States by foreign nationals, since the date of this order or the last reporting period, whichever is later; and

(iv) any other information relevant to public safety and security as determined by the Secretary of Homeland Security and the Attorney General, including information on the immigration status of foreign nationals charged with major offenses.

(b) The Secretary of State shall, within one year of the date of this order, provide a report on the estimated long-term costs of the USRAP at the Federal, State, and local levels.

Sec. 11. General Provisions. (a) Nothing in this order shall be construed to impair or otherwise affect:

(i) the authority granted by law to an executive department or agency, or the head thereof; or

(ii) the functions of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget relating to budgetary, administrative, or legislative proposals.

(b) This order shall be implemented consistent with applicable law and subject to the availability of appropriations.

(c) This order is not intended to, and does not, create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or in equity by any party against the United States, its departments, agencies, or entities, its officers, employees, or agents, or any other person.

Federal Judge Grants Stay For Those Detained Under Trump's Travel Ban

By Jennifer Bain And Kathianne Boniello

New York Post, January 28, 2017

A federal judge in Brooklyn ordered a stop to the Trump administration's deportations of hundreds of travelers who arrived in the US on Friday and Saturday from seven predominately Muslim countries.

Judge Anne Donnelly on Saturday night granted a request from the American Civil Liberties Union to stop deportations of those who were on their way to the US as Trump's order took effect.

The 100 to 200 detainees, including at least 10 at Kennedy Airport, will not be released immediately. But for now, they also will not be sent back to where they came from.

Donnelly issued her order after ACLU lawyer Lee Gelernt stated that at least one person at JFK was being put on a flight back to Syria as the hearing commenced.

That led the judge to ask aloud if the Trump administration could assure that the people about to be deported would not suffer irreperable harm.

Susan Riley, a civil lawyer who works in the Brooklyn US Attorney's office, couldn't answer the judge's question. Judge Anne Donnelly

New York Law Journal

"This has unfolded with such speed that we haven't had any opportunity to address any of the issues, the legal issues of the status of anyone who may be at the airport," Riley said.

"If they had come in two days ago we wouldn't be here. Am I right?" Donnelly asked.

The judge noted that the government did not argue that the detainees posed any risk.

The government hasn't shared the names of those detained and won't let ACLU lawyers see all the detainees, ACLU lawyer Lee Gelernt said.

The ACLU insisted the detainees posed no risk. "It's not as if these people weren't vetted, they were just caught in transit. They were in a horrible position," said Gelernt..

Donnelly's decision came in a class action lawsuit filed in Brooklyn federal court earlier Saturday. Hundreds of people gathered outside the courthouse in downtown Brooklyn, and a few filtered in to the courtroom to attend the hearing.

The detainees may find themselves in government detention for several weeks at least. Further proceedings in the case are set for next month.

Judge Stays Deportations; Trump Order Barring Refugees, Migrants From Muslim Countries Triggers Chaos, Outrage

By Jerry Markon, Emma Brown And Katherine Shaver

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

A federal judge in New York stayed deportations nationwide of those detained on entry to the United States following an executive order from President Trump that targeted citizens from seven predominantly Muslim countries.

Judge Ann Donnelly of the U.S. District Court in Brooklyn granted a request from the American Civil Liberties Union to stay the deportations after determining that the risk of injury to those detained by being returned to their home countries necessitated the decision.

And only minutes after the judge's ruling in New York, another came in Virginia when U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema issued a temporary restraining order to block the removal of any green-card holders being detained at Dulles International Airport for seven days. Brinkema's action also ordered that lawyers have access to those held there because of the president's ban.

Trump's order reverberated across the world on Saturday making it increasingly clear that the controversial measure he had promised during his presidential campaign was casting a wider net than even his opponents had feared.

Confusion and concern among immigrant advocates mounted throughout the day as travelers from the Middle East were detained at U.S. airports or sent home. A middle-of-the-night lawsuit filed on behalf of two Iraqi men challenged Trump's executive action, which was signed Friday and initially cast as applying to refugees and migrants.

But as the day progressed, administration officials confirmed that the sweeping order also targeted U.S. legal residents from the named countries — green-card holders — who happened to be abroad when it was signed. Also subject to being barred entry into the United States are dual nationals, or people born in one of the seven countries who hold passports even from U.S. allies, such as the United Kingdom.

The virtually unprecedented measures triggered harsh reactions from not only Democrats and others who typically advocate for immigrants but also key sectors of the U.S. business community. Leading technology companies recalled scores of overseas employees and sharply criticized the president. Legal experts forecast a wave of litigation over the order, calling it unconstitutional. Canada announced it would accept asylum applications from U.S. green-card holders.

Yet Trump, who centered his campaign in part on his vow to crack down on illegal immigrants and impose what became known as his "Muslim ban,'' was unbowed. As White House officials insisted that the measure strengthens national security, the president stood squarely behind it.

"It's not a Muslim ban, but we were totally prepared," Trump told reporters in the Oval Office. "You see it at the airports, you see it all over. It's working out very nicely, and we're going to have a very, very strict ban, and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years."

In New York, Judge Donnelly seemed to have little patience for the arguments presented by the government, which focused heavily on the fact that the two defendants named in the lawsuit had already been released. At one point, she visibly lost patience with a government attorney who was participating by phone.

Donnelly noted that those detained were suffering mostly from the bad fortune of traveling while the ban went into effect. "Our own government presumably approved their entry to the country," she said at one point, noting that, had it been two days prior, those detained would have been granted admission without question.

In the middle of the hearing, ACLU attorney Lee Gelernt informed the court that he'd received word of an imminent deportation to Syria, scheduled within the hour. That prompted Donnelly to ask if the government could assure that the person would not suffer irreparable harm. Receiving no such assurance, she granted the stay to the broad group included in the ACLU's request.

A senior Department of Homeladnd Security official had no comment about the judicial rulings late Saturday and said the department was consulting with its lawyers.

The official said enforcement of the president's order on Saturday had created minimal disruption given that only a small number of the several hundred thousand travelers arriving at U.S. airports daily had been affected.

Nationwide, he said, 109 people had been denied entry into the United States. All had been in transit when Trump signed the order, and some had already departed the United States on flights by late Saturday while others were still being detained awaiting flights. In addition, 173 people had not been allowed to board U.S.-bound flights at foreign airports.

The official said that officers doing case-by-case reviews had granted 81 waivers so far to green-card holders.

DHS began implementing the president's order immediately after he signed it, according to the official. He declined to say whether the department had an operational plan ready at that time.

Though several congressional Republicans denounced the order, the vast majority remained silent, and a few voiced crucial support — including, most prominently, House Speaker Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), who had rejected Trump's anti-Muslim proposals during the campaign. "This is not a religious test, and it is not a ban on people of any religion,'' Ryan said Saturday. "This order does not affect the vast majority of Muslims in the world."

The president's order, signed Friday, suspends admission to the United States of all refugees for 120 days and bars for 90 days the entry of any citizen from Iraq, Iran, Syria, Yemen, Sudan, Libya and Somalia. That list excludes several majority-Muslim nations — notably Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Indonesia — where the Trump Organization, now run by the president's adult sons, is active and which in some cases have also faced troublesome issues with terrorism.

According to the text of the order, the restriction applies to countries that have already been excluded from programs allowing people to travel to the United States without a visa because of terrorism concerns. Hewing closely to nations already named as terrorism concerns elsewhere in law might have allowed the White House to avoid angering powerful and wealthy majority-Muslim allies, such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

Amid widespread confusion on Saturday about how the order will be enforced, some administration officials acknowledged that its rollout had been chaotic. Officials tried to reassure travelers and their families, pointing out that green-card holders in the United States will not be affected and noting that DHS is allowed to grant waivers to those individuals and others deemed to not pose a security threat. It can take years for someone to become a green-card holder, or lawful permanent resident authorized to permanently live and work in the country.

"If you've been living in the United States for 15 years and you own a business and your family is here, will you be granted a waiver? I'm assuming yes, but we are working that out,'' said one official, who could not be more specific because details remained so cloudy. A senior White House official later said that waivers will be evaluated on a case-by-case basis and that green-card holders in the United States will have to meet with a consular officer before leaving the country.

But officials made clear that the federal officers detaining refugees and migrants with valid U.S. visas and restricting them from entering the country were following orders handed down by top DHS officials, at the White House's behest.

The order drew cries of outrage from a range of activist and advocates for Muslims, Arabs and immigrants. More than 4,000 academics from universities nationwide signed a statement of opposition and voiced concern the ban would become permanent. They described it as discriminatory and "inhumane, ineffective and un-American."

The executive action has caused "complete chaos" and torn apart families, said Abed Ayoub, legal and policy director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

At Dulles International Airport, Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe (D) addressed more than 100 people protesting Trump's order.

"We want to know who is being detained and why they are being detained," McAuliffe said. "I remind everybody we are a land of immigrants. . . . Discriminatory tactics breed hatred.'' His remarks were cheered by demonstrators holding signs saying "Refugees welcome here" and "Stand with Muslims."

In New York City, lawyers for two Iraqi men detained at John F. Kennedy International Airport — one of whom served the U.S. military mission in Iraq — filed a federal lawsuit challenging the order as unconstitutional. They also are seeking class certification so they may represent all refugees and visa-holders who are being held at U.S. ports of entry.

One of the men, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, was released Saturday afternoon without explanation from federal officials. "This is the humanity, this is the soul of America,'' he told reporters. “This is what pushed me to move, to leave my country and come here. . . . America is the land of freedom — the land of freedom, the land of the right.’’

While immigration advocates said at least one refu-gee family had been detained at San Francisco International Airport, there was no immediate count of how many refugees were being held at airports nationwide. Advocates said that ticketed passengers also had been barred from boarding U.S.-bound flights overseas, and they confirmed that some green-card holders who left the United States have been unable to return.

In Cairo, airport officials said seven U.S.-bound migrants — six from Iraq and one from Yemen — were prevented Saturday from boarding an EgyptAir flight to JFK Airport, according to the Associated Press.

Other advocates promised further legal challenges. The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) denounced the order and said it would file a lawsuit challenging it as unconstitutional.

“There is no evidence that refugees — the most thoroughly vetted of all people entering our nation — are a threat to national security,” Lena F. Masri, CAIR’s national litigation director, said in a statement. “This is an order that is based on bigotry, not reality.”

In a conference call with reporters, immigration lawyers and advocates said Trump’s order violated the Constitution, along with U.S. and international laws that guarantee migrants the right to apply for asylum at the border and the Immigration and Nationality Act, which forbids discrimination in the issuance of visas based on race, nationality, place of birth or place of residence.

But Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which advocates for lower immigration levels, praised Trump for taking action to pause the refugee resettlement program and limit immigration from the seven countries.

“It’s a prudent measure,” he said. “It’s not the end of the world. It’s not the Statue of Liberty crying. The reaction has been hyperbolic.”

The effects of Trump’s order played out nationwide.

In Dallas, Behzad Honarjou, 43, was supposed to pick up his mother, 70-year-old Shahin Haffanpour, at the airport on Saturday. But when she arrived from Iran via Dubai, she was told that because of the executive order she would be sent back to Iran the next morning.

“I don’t know what to do,” Honarjou said. He said he was seeking an attorney to file an emergency habeas petition, but the courts were closed. Haffanpour has an immigrant’s visa issued by the U.S. Embassy in Ankara, Turkey, last year.

In Philadelphia, Sarah Assali said six relatives from Syria — two uncles, their wives and two cousins — were detained after arriving at the airport there early Saturday. Although they are Christian immigrants with valid visas to join family in this country, they were put on a plane back to Doha, Qatar, three hours later, Assali said.

She said her family members were not allowed to call or contact their family in the United States before being removed. “We don’t know what’s going to happen next.”

Trump Says Immigration Ban Working ‘Nicely’ As Protests, Detainments Hit Airports

By Doug Stanglin And Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 28, 2017

The fallout from President Trump’s temporary ban on refugees to the U.S. struck with full force Saturday, blocking some travelers from boarding their planes overseas, compelling others to turn around upon arrival in the U.S., and prompting customs agents at New York’s JFK Airport to detain at least a dozen people, including a former Iraqi translator for the U.S. military in Baghdad.

The growing chaos also sparked legal challenges, airport protests, condemnations from politicians and denunciations from advocacy groups.

American Civil Liberties Union lawyers were scheduled to appear in federal court in Brooklyn Saturday evening to argue for a nationwide stay that would block deportation of people stranded in U.S. airports under the ban. The ACLU and other legal groups had filed a lawsuit in reaction to the ban earlier in the day.

New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo Saturday tweeted an offer of support to those who had been stopped at the state’s airports: “I have directed Port Authority, @NYSDOS, & my Counsel’s Office to jointly explore all legal options to assist anyone detained at NY airports.”

Cuomo’s tweet linked to a statement in which he objected to refugees being blocked from entering the U.S.

“I never thought I’d see the day when refugees, who have fled war-torn countries in search of a better life, would be turned away from our doorstep. We are a nation of bridges, not walls, and a great many of us still believe in the words ‘give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses …’ “ he wrote. “This is not who we are, not who we should be.”

Speaking to hundreds of demonstrators at JFK Airport, Rep. Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y., called the ban ineffective, discriminatory, “disgusting,” and said it “goes against every ounce of our traditions from George Washington onward.”

“We are here to say it should be stopped and be revoked,” he said.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The reverberations began only hours after Trump signed the executive order Friday that suspends the entry of all refugees to the United States for 120 days, halts the admission of refugees from Syria indefinitely and bars entry for three months to residents from the predominantly Muslim countries of Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia and Yemen.

In brief remarks while signing his latest executive orders Saturday, Trump maintained the order isn't a "Muslim ban."

"It's working out very nicely. We're going to have a strict ban, and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years," he said.

The ban includes green card holders who are authorized to live and work in the United States, according to Gillian Christensen, a Homeland Security spokeswoman, Reuters reported. It was unclear how many green card holders would be affected, but exceptions can be made on a case-by-case basis, the news agency says.

At Washington's Dulles International Airport, where a protest was mounted, Gov. Terry McAuliffe and Virginia Attorney General Mark Herring said the state was considering taking legal action to challenge the ban.

About 50 people were detained at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport, said Alia Salem, executive director for DFW Chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR). Families have been waiting at Terminal D in anticipation of meeting relatives who been held up in U.S Customs. A representative with CAIR met with families waiting for relatives. Some of them have been waiting for several hours.

At Philadelphia International Airport, two Syrian families, described as Christians, were briefly detained Saturday after arriving from Qatar and sent back three hours later. The families included two brothers, their wives and two children, according to a family member form Allentown, Pa., NBC10 reported. "This is like a nightmare come true," said Joseph Assali, who noted that the families had visas and green cards legally obtained months ago.

Mohammed Al Rawi, chief information officer for Los Angeles County, said on Facebook that his father was removed from a flight in Qatar as a direct result of the order. "My 71 year old dad is in Qatar boarding LAX flight to come visit us and and he's being sent back to Iraq. Some US official told him that Trump canceled all visas," he wrote.

Foreigners studying at U.S. universities who were part of study abroad programs were also stuck. Even Customs and Border Protection agents were confused about how to handle Trump's order and responding in different ways, he said.

Those holding dual nationality in the seven nations involved in the ban will also be barred from entering the United States, the Wall Street Journal reported citing a statement from the State Department that has yet to be released.

In Cairo, seven migrants — six from Iraq and one from Yemen — were being escorted by officials from the U.N. refugee agency when they were stopped from boarding the EgyptAir plane, the Associated Press reported, quoting Cairo airport officials.

The authorities stepped in after contacting their counterparts at JFK Airport, where the plane was headed. The officials spoke to AP on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to brief the media.

Only one of the 12 picked up at JFK Airport was freed by Saturday afternoon. Hameed Khaldi Darweesh, who worked a translator for American forces for 10 years, had been detained overnight following his arrival from Istanbul. He said he had feared he would be sent back to Iraq, which his family fled because of death threats.

When asked by reporters outside the airport what he thought of Trump, Darweesh said, "I don't know. He's a president, I'm a normal person."

He said he was focused instead on the lawyers who won his release. "This is the soul of America," Darweesh said. "This is what pushed me to move, to leave my country and come here. America is the land of freedom."

Among the 11 still being held at the airport was another Iraqi refugee, Haider Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, who was trying to join his wife and child. His wife worked for a U.S. contractor in Iraq as an accountant, was granted a refugee visa and is now living in Houston. Alshawi was approved for a visa to join his wife and their 7-year-old son on Jan. 11.

According to a federal complaint filed on behalf of two Iraqis being held at JFK airport, one attorney approached Customs and Border Patrol agents with a request to speak to his client, but was told they were not the ones to talk to about seeing him.

"Who is the person to talk to?" the lawyer asked, according to the complaint. The unidentified CBP agents responded: "Mr. President. Call Mr. Trump."

According to one of the lawyers, Mark Doss, the pair had been approved for entry as refugees but were in the air flying to the U.S. night when the order was being signed.

A senior administration official said in a White House briefing Saturday afternoon that U.S. Customs and Border protection was working to provide waivers for the two Iraqis involved in the lawsuit.

"No person living or residing overseas has a right to entry into the United States," the official said, declining to be identified under the rules of the briefing. "There is not a travel ban (from the seven countries). It is a cessation of most travel with case-by-case exceptions."

Abed Ayoud, legal and policy director for the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, said they've received more than 1,000 calls by midday Saturday from people who have been stranded or detained in the U.S. and abroad.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

He said legal immigrants traveling overseas to attend funerals and visit family when the president signed his order are now unable to return to the U.S.

"The impact of what President Trump was looking for is in full effect," Ayoud said.

"Complete chaos."

In Tehran, Iran's foreign minister, Javad Zarif, said his country would respond by banning all U.S. citizens from the country as long as the U.S. policy was in effect, but would not include anyone who already received a visa. In a statement, the foreign ministry called the U.S. order "a clear insult to the Islamic world, and especially to the great nation of Iran."

In signing the executive order, Trump said the new administration needed time to develop a stricter screening process for refugees, immigrants and visitors. "I'm establishing new vetting measures to keep radical Islamic terrorists out of the United States of America. Don't want them here," he said.

The executive order, which he said was aimed at protecting Americans from terrorist attacks, singled out Syrian refugees as "detrimental to the interests of the United States."

When the refugee program resumes, the executive order calls for changes to "prioritize refugee claims made by individuals on the basis of religious-based persecution, provided that the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country of nationality."

"We only want to admit those into our country who will support our country and love deeply our people," Trump said.

CAIR said it will file a federal lawsuit Monday in the Eastern District of Virginia to challenge the constitutionality of the order, charging its apparent purpose and underlying motive is to ban people of the Islamic faith from Muslim-majority countries from entering the United States.

"There is no evidence that refugees – the most thoroughly vetted of all people entering our nation – are a threat to national security," said CAIR National Litigation Director Lena F. Masri. "This is an order that is based on bigotry, not reality."

Marielena Hincapié, executive director of the National Immigration Law Center, one of the groups representing the Iraqi men detained at JFK, said the lawsuit is directed solely at immigrants who have been caught in legal limbo following Trump's announcement. The lawyers are trying to expand it into a class action suit to cover the untold number of refugees caught in the same situation.

Hincapié said they are planning separate lawsuits challenging the legality of Trump's executive actions on immigration, partly because they target majority Muslim nations. But she said for now, they simply want to resolve the cases of people who are being detained at airports. They are trying to get an emergency hearing before a judge this weekend.

"These are people who already had a horrific experience of being a refugee," she said. "They left everything behind. And now, to find themselves in detention at an airport with no contacts, not knowing what can be done, only hearing little bits and pieces on the news about this executive order. I think folks are just scared and don't know how to respond at this moment."

Trump Defends Order: 'It's Not A Muslim Ban'

By Jordan Fabian

The Hill, January 28, 2017

President Trump on Saturday denied that his sweeping executive order barring refugees and individuals from several predominantly Muslim nations amounted to a ban on Muslims.

"It's not a Muslim ban," Trump told reporters in the Oval Office after he signed three new directives.

The order, handed down Friday evening, sowed chaos as government agencies scrambled to implement the broad new policy.

But Trump insisted his administration was "totally prepared" to carry out the refugee and travel ban, which affects more than 100 million people around the world.

"It's working out very nicely," he said. "You see it at the airports, you see it all over."

The new policy sparked widespread outrage from civil-liberties groups and Democrats, who called it a discriminatory and unconstitutional policy directed at Muslims.

The Trump administration has already found itself embroiled in a legal battle over the order after two Iraqi nationals with ties to the U.S. military filed a lawsuit after they were detained upon their arrival Friday night in New York.

Both men had been granted visas to enter the U.S. Hameed Khalid Darweesh, who worked as an interpreter for the U.S. military, was released from custody early Saturday.

The president said he is sticking with the new policy over the objection of its critics, saying it will help keep out people who could carry out terrorist attacks on American soil.

"We're going to have a very, very strict ban and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years," he said.

Trump's order bars Syrian refugees indefinitely and halts the country's refugee resettlement program for four months.

It also denies entry for 90 days to individuals from seven majority-Muslim countries: Iran, Iraq, Syria, Yemen, Somalia, Sudan and Libya; affecting roughly 134 million people.

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has designated those nations as "countries of concern" for terrorism.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The order also directs DHS to determine which other nations do not provide appropriate information about its citizens, and therefore could be added to the list.

Despite Trump's claims, critics of the policy say it amount to a ban on Muslims.

"On Holocaust Memorial Day, Trump restricted refugees from Muslim-majority countries. Make no mistake — this is a Muslim ban," Sen. Kamala Harris (D-Calif.) said in a statement on Friday.

Speaker Paul Ryan's (R-Wis.) office defended Trump's executive order on Saturday, maintaining that it does not target Muslims.

"This is not a religious test and it is not a ban on people of any religion," Ryan's spokeswoman AshLee Strong told The Washington Post.

"Mr. President, look at us – this is America, what you have done is shameful, it's un-American and it has created so much confusion," said Rep. Nydia Velázquez (D-N.Y.) while standing outside of New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, where the two Iraqi men were detained.

They point to Trump's Dec. 2015 call for a "total and complete shutdown" of Muslim immigration to the U.S. He later softened his stance, saying he wanted to target individuals from terror-prone nations.

The ban does not cover all Muslim-majority countries or Muslims worldwide.

The nations where the Sept. 11 hijackers hailed from — Saudi Arabia, Egypt the United Arab Emirates and Lebanon — are not included on the list. Neither is Pakistan, the home of the 2010 Times Square bomber Faisal Shahzad.

But some of the president's most ardent backers still referred to the order as a Muslim ban.

"Making America Great Again! #MuslimBan #saturdaymorning #AmericaFirst @GenFlynn @realDonaldTrump" tweeted Michael Flynn, Jr., the son of Trump's national security adviser.

Making America Great Again! #MuslimBan #saturdaymorning #AmericaFirst @GenFlynn @realDonaldTrump https://t.co/fyn6JYpJf9— Michael Flynn Jr (@mflynnJR) January 28, 2017

Trump also said in an interview Friday he wants to prioritize Christian refugees from the Middle East over Muslims once admissions resume.

There was additional confusion over the implementation of the order.

Multiple media reports indicated senior officials at the State Department and DHS, the agencies charged with carrying out the ban, were not aware of the changes before Friday.

Travelers and refugees at airports around the world were grounded as authorities scrambled to interpret the new travel restrictions, including whether they applied to U.S. permanent residents from the affected countries.

A senior administration official later said green-card holders currently abroad do fall under the ban, although they would be considered on a case-by-case to return.

More broadly, the White House pushed back on reports of miscommunication, saying key officials at both agencies has been informed of the plans over the past few weeks.

Asked whether the government was ready to put the order in place, Trump replied, "totally, totally."

White House Defends Immigrant Ban As Airports Stop Travelers

By Bob Van Voris

Bloomberg Politics, January 28, 2017

President Donald Trump defended his order suspending refugee resettlements in the U.S. and barring entry to people from from Iraq, Syria and five other Middle East nations, as confusion broke out at airports around the world and government agencies and airlines tried to interpret the new rules.

"It's not a Muslim ban," Trump told reporters in the Oval Office. "We were totally prepared. It's working out very nicely. You see it at the airports, you see it all over. It's working out very nicely."

The executive order, aimed at stopping would-be terrorists from entering the U.S., led to people being detained at airports from Dallas to Atlanta to New York, and provoked an outcry from immigration lawyers, who said it violated the U.S. Constitution. Airlines around the world, given no advance warning, blocked travelers from the affected countries – including some who are legal U.S. residents – from getting on planes to the U.S. and struggled to understand what they should do.

At least a dozen people were being held at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport, including 10 Iranians, Andre Segura, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, said in an interview. Officials there agreed to release Hameed Khalid Darweesh, an interpreter who had worked for the U.S. military in Iraq, after he was detained. Another Iraqi was also released.

The order impacted immigrants from Muslim-majority countries Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen. A senior White House official, who asked not to be identified because he wasn't authorized to speak publicly about the matter, said the administration had serious concerns about abuses in immigration programs and needed to impose the 90-day ban on immigrants from the seven countries while it comes up with new vetting procedures.

The order also halts refugee resettlement to the U.S. for 120 days, and orders that refugee admissions for 2017 be cut to 50,000 from the planned limit of 110,000.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The official said reports of individuals stranded at airports or uncertain about their travel plans paled in comparison to the possibility that a terrorist or someone with terrorist sympathies could enter the U.S.

The outcry from overseas leaders was also swift. In a phone call with Trump today, French Prime Minister Francois Hollande said defending democracy "requires observing fundamental principles," among them welcoming refugees, according to a statement from Hollande's office.

On Twitter, Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif promised reciprocal measures, though he said anyone with a valid visa would be welcomed "unlike the U.S."

The U.S. move "will be recorded in history as a great gift to extremists and their supporters," Zarif wrote on Twitter. "Collective discrimination aids terrorist recruitment by deepening fault-lines exploited by extremist demagogues to swell their ranks."

Abed Ayoub, the legal and policy director at the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, said on a conference call that Trump's move was causing "chaos within the community and at our borders." Along with the ACLU and others, his group filed a lawsuit in federal court in Brooklyn claiming that the order is unconstitutional and exceeds presidential authority under immigration law. It asks the court to block enforcement.

"This is a Muslim ban. It has nothing to do with national security. It has everything to do with Islamophobia and xenophobia," Ayoub said. He said people from the countries in question were being told not to leave the U.S. because they wouldn't be allowed back in.

As Saturday went on, new details emerged about the extent of the order's reach. A State Department official, who wasn't authorized to speak publicly and asked not to be identified, said the order applied not only to citizens of the seven countries but also to dual nationals who aren't U.S. citizens. The official said visa interviews won't be scheduled for nationals of the countries during the 90-day ban.

Green-card holders – legal permanent residents – from the seven nations were also barred. Ayoub said people had been detained at airports in Atlanta, Houston, Detroit and Washington, as well as New York.

Exemptions Possible

A second senior administration official said it was "ludicrous" to describe the extreme vetting order as a Muslim ban, noting that countries like Afghanistan were excluded from the list of countries from which immigration was blocked. The first noted that the U.S. admitted more Muslims to visit or immigrate than any country in the world not in the region, and would continue to do so.

Those already outside the country can apply for a case-by-case exemption, the White House said, pledging they would be expeditiously processed. Green-card holders from the affected countries already in the U.S. can seek a waiver before they travel abroad.

The official acknowledged the priority the plan gives to Christians. Language in the order demands that when refugee admissions are allowed again, priority must be given to claims of persecution based on religions that are in the minority in the country. The seven targeted by the order are all predominantly Muslim.

Speaking with Christian Broadcasting Network on Friday in an interview that will air in full on Sunday night, Trump suggested that Christians had been treated unfairly by U.S. procedures.

"If you were a Muslim you could come in, but if you were a Christian, it was almost impossible and the reason that was so unfair – everybody was persecuted, in all fairness – but they were chopping off the heads of everybody but more so the Christians," Trump said. "And I thought it was very, very unfair. So we are going to help them."

Google Response

Alphabet Inc.'s Google said more than 100 employees who were out of the country on vacation or work assignments are subject to the order. A spokeswoman declined to say Saturday whether any of them had been denied boarding on flights or detained in the U.S. One employee rushed back from a trip to New Zealand to make it into the U.S. before the order was signed, Chief Executive Officer Sundar Pichai wrote in a memo to employees.

The consulting firm McKinsey & Co. sent a memo to employees advising them of the travel ban and outlining who may be affected. The memo from the consulting firm's assistant general counsel said in part:

"To be safe, we are advising for now that all who are not U.S. citizens and who were born in one of these countries not depart the U.S. as you may not be able to get back in for at least another 90 days. For those who are currently outside of the U.S. – we urge you to try to return immediately as you may not be readmitted."

Officials from the State Department and Department of Homeland Security were preparing guidance Saturday to help airlines and other travel companies better guide their clients, the White House said. That information wasn't provided ahead of time because the administration didn't want information about the action to leak, which, they said, could have allowed a potential terrorist to circumvent the new rules.

Criticism of Trump's executive order emerged from both the left and the right. Alex Nowrasteh, an immigration-policy analyst at the conservative Cato Institute, wrote a post before the order was signed saying that foreigners from the seven nations affected by the ban had "killed zero Americans in terrorist attacks on U.S. soil between 1975 and 2015."

"The measures taken here will have virtually no effect on improving U.S. national security," he wrote.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Democrats in Congress roundly criticized the order, while Republican response was more muted. Senator Tim Kaine, the Virginia Democrat who was Hillary Clinton's running mate, said Trump had "defied everything our nation stands for." Republican Senator Ben Sasse of Nebraska called the order "too broad."

"If we send a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. sees all Muslims as jihadis, the terrorist recruiters win by telling kids that America is banning Muslims and that this is America versus one religion," he said in a statement.

Donald Trump Says His Order To Bar Refugees And Travelers Is 'Working Out Very Nicely'

He got what he wanted.

By Elise Foley

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump, like many people around the world, has seen reports about what's happening at airports in the aftermath of his executive order that left refugees, immigrants and other travelers unable to enter the United States.

He thinks it's going great.

"It's working out very nicely," Trump said of his executive order on Saturday. "You see it at the airports, you see it all over."

The president signed the order on Friday to bar all refugees from entering the U.S. for 120 days, keep out Syrian refugees indefinitely, and restrict travel for individuals from seven countries: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen. The ban applies even to green card holders from those countries who reside in the United States: They may now be admitted only on a case-by-case basis. It also applies to dual-nationals of one of the seven countries and another nation.

Trump is right that airports have become the principal place to observe the effect his order is having on people's lives.

Many people who fit the banned categories arrived at U.S. airports with their previously approved visas, only to be detained and barred from entry. There are numerous individual stories: an Iraqi who worked for the U.S. military as an interpreter during the war, only to be detained at the airport; a Syrian woman trying to visit her sick mother; a Syrian family who was set to move to the United States and now won't be allowed to.

There are infants who are U.S. citizens being detained at Los Angeles International Airport because their parents are legal permanent residents and elderly people whose families are unable to reach them to ensure they have their medication, according to attorneys.

Hundreds of protesters have also gathered at airports, with especially large crowds at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport.

Some of the chaos has resulted from the language of the order and the fact that it's not clear what it all means. Trump's own administration doesn't seem to have worked out all the details. A White House official told reporters on Saturday that the administration is trying to determine how to define "in transit" in a segment of the order that says there can be an exception for certain refugees "when the person is already in transit and denying admission would cause undue hardship."

"We were totally prepared," Trump said about the order later on Saturday.

He also said the executive order was "not a Muslim ban" — something some Republicans, such as House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), have used as a justification for accepting it even though they'd condemned Trump's call back in 2015 for a blanket ban on people who practice Islam.

The new executive order does not mention any religion specifically, but all of the countries on the list have Muslim-majority populations.

The president also said on Friday that he would prioritize resettling Syrian Christian refugees, in spite of his directive to bar refugees in general. The executive order would give him an avenue to do so: It says an exception can be made for refugees who are members of a persecuted religious minority in their home country, which would leave Syrian Muslims out.

Update: The American Civil Liberties Union and refugee relief organizations filed an action in federal court Saturday morning on behalf of two Iraqi nationals who were detained at JFK Airport. On Saturday night, a federal judge temporarily halted parts of Trump's executive order.

Trump Order Barring Refugees, Migrants From Muslim Countries Triggers Chaos, Outrage

By Jerry Markon, Emma Brown And David Nakamura

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

President Trump's executive order barring refugees and migrants from predominantly Muslim countries from entry into the United States rippled across the world on Saturday, causing widespread confusion, triggering outrage among immigrant advocates and leading to the detention at U.S. airports of people flying into the country.

In addition to blocking all entries from seven countries, including business people, students and others, the ban is also being applied to U.S. legal residents from those nations — so-called green card holders — who were traveling abroad at the time the order was signed, federal officials said Saturday.

Those familiar with the order, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they said its rollout had been chaotic, said green card holders currently in the United States will not be affected. They noted that the Department of Homeland Security is allowed to grant waivers to those individuals and others deemed to not pose a threat to national security.

"If you've been living in the United States for 15 years and you own a business and your family is here, will you be granted a waiver? I'm assuming yes, but we are working that out,'' said one official, who could not be more specific because details of the possible waivers remained cloudy, as did many other details of how the ban will be enforced.

But officials made clear that the federal officers detaining refugees and migrants holding valid U.S. visas and restricting them from entering the country were following orders handed down by top DHS officials. Those orders, the officials said, reflect the desires of Trump's White House.

The president's order, signed Friday, suspends admission to the United States of all refugees for 120 days and bars for 90 days the entry of any citizens from Iraq, Iran, Syria, Yemen, Sudan, Libya and Somalia. Trump said that the goal is to screen out "radical Islamic terrorists" and that priority for admission would be given to Christians.

The executive action has caused "complete chaos" and torn apart families, said Abed Ayoub, legal and policy director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee. "It's causing a negative and destructive impact on the Arab-American community," Ayoub said.

The White House on Saturday rushed to explain and defend its action, saying it strengthens national security and denying that it targeted Muslims. "The notion that this is a Muslim ban is ludicrous," one senior administration official said. A second official noted that many majority-Muslim countries, including Afghanistan, Pakistan and Turkey, were excluded from the measure.

And House Speaker Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), who frequently clashed with Trump during the presidential campaign, strongly backed the president's executive order. "This is not a religious test and it is not a ban on people of any religion,'' he said. "This order does not affect the vast majority of Muslims in the world. It does not affect a large number of nations that are Muslim-majority.''

Lawyers for two Iraqi men detained at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, one of whom served the U.S. military mission in Iraq, filed a middle-of-the-night lawsuit in federal court challenging Trump's order as unconstitutional and seeking the release of their clients. They also are seeking class certification so they may represent all refugees and visa-holders who are being held at U.S. ports of entry.

One of the men, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, was released Saturday afternoon without explanation from federal officials, according to his lawyer, Mark Doss. "We are very grateful that Mr. Darweesh has been released," Doss told reporters outside JFK International Airport in an interview broadcast on CNN. But 11 others are still being detained at JFK, he said, and "people will stay here until they are released."

While immigration advocates said at least one refu-gee family had been detained at San Francisco International Airport, there was no immediate count of how many refugees were being held at airports nationwide. Advocates said that people have not only been held at the border but that ticketed passengers have been barred from boarding U.S.-bound aircraft overseas, and they confirmed that green-card holders who left the U.S. have been unable to return.

Cairo airport officials say seven U.S.-bound migrants — six from Iraq and one from Yemen — were prevented Saturday from boarding an EgyptAir flight to JFK airport, according to the Associated Press.

As outrage mounted, other advocates promised further legal challenges. The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) denounced the order and said it would file a lawsuit next week challenging it as unconstitutional.

"There is no evidence that refugees — the most thoroughly vetted of all people entering our nation — are a threat to national security," Lena F. Masri, CAIR's national litigation director, said in a statement. "This is an order that is based on bigotry, not reality."

Both Iraqi men detained at JFK airport held valid U.S. visas and had been receiving pro-bono legal assistance for several months from the New York-based International Refugee Assistance Project. Betsy Fisher, the organization's policy director, said the men were in the air on separate flights when Trump signed the temporary refu-gee ban Friday. She called their detention "our worst-case scenario."

"In the coming weeks we will be advocating to show why this policy is bad for U.S. national security, why it goes against our humanitarian responsibilities, and why it is fundamentally un-American," Fisher said. "If there is one fundamentally American value, then it is welcoming those who are fleeing persecution. At our best, this is what we can do."

The International Refugee Assistance Project was among several prominent immigration-rights organizations that filed the lawsuit in New York, including the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Immigration Law Center.

One of the Iraqi men detained at JFK is Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, 33, who holds a visa that allowed him to join his wife and young child in Texas. His wife had worked for a U.S. government contractor and came to the United States as a refu-gee in 2014.

Darweesh, 53, had worked as a contractor for the U.S. government in Iraq for about a decade, including as an interpreter for the Army. He and his wife and three children had spent more than two years securing a special immigrant visa, granted to Iraqis who assisted U.S. military forces.

The Darweesh family landed in New York at approximately 6 p.m. Friday , and Hameed Darweesh was detained by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials, according to the complaint filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York. He is at risk of being returned to a country where he faces enormous personal danger due to his aid to the U.S. government, the complaint says.

Darweesh told reporters outside the airport on Saturday that he was thankful so many people came to his aid, leaving their families to help secure his release.

"This is the humanity, this is the soul of America. This is what pushed me to move, to leave my country and come here," Darweesh said. "America is the land of freedom, the land of freedom, the land of the right. ... America is the greatest nation, the greatest people in the world."

Brandon Friedman worked with Darweesh in 2003, when he was an infantry officer with the Army's 101st Airborne Division. He said Darweesh, who was among the first Iraqis to sign up to serve the U.S. military, was "fearless" and saved countless U.S. lives.

"This is a guy who has done a lot more for this country than most people who were born here," Friedman said. He said he hopes Trump's executive order is rescinded quickly: "This is putting U.S. troops in danger because it is withdrawing the incentive that folks like Hameed have to work with us. And we depend on them to a great extent."

The detention of a man who served the U.S. military was particularly objectionable to Matt Zeller, founder of No One Left Behind, which aims to help Iraqi and Afghan people who worked for the U.S. military secure special immigrant visas.

He said America is breaking its promise to men and women who served the U.S. military at great personal risk to themselves — which is not only wrong, he said, but also undermines trust in the United States and endangers the lives of any future service member sent overseas.

"This is going to get future Americans killed in future wars. It comes down to that," he said. "We're never going to live down this shame if we let this go on."

Marielena Hincapie, executive director for the National Immigration Law Center, said immigration advocates first learned of immigrants being detained Friday evening after a report from a family detained in San Francisco. The advocates attempted to reach U.S. Customs and Border Protection but were unsuccessful.

"We were trying to find out if it was lack of communication or what was the plan?" she said in an interview Saturday morning.

The lawyers for those detained at JFK said they were told officials at the airport couldn't help them when they began to seek their clients' release.

"Who is the person to talk to?" the attorneys asked, according to the court complaint. The CBP agents responded: "Mr. President. Call Mr. Trump."

White House Says U.S. Still Most Open Immigration System Even After Trump Orders

By Stephen Dinan

Washington Times, January 28, 2017

The U.S. will still be the most open country in the world for foreign visitors even after President Trump's new executive order hitting pause on the refugee program and the Visa Waiver program and suspending visits from a half-dozen war-torn countries, administration officials insisted Saturday.

Mr. Trump's order has sparked confusion and fear and even invited an attempted class action lawsuit from civil liberties groups who are trying to force the administration to back down, citing two Iraqi men who were already denied entry despite having obtained visas earlier this month.

A senior administration official, briefing reporters as reports of chaos spread, said one of the two men has already been granted a waiver and the other would soon be approved under the exemptions Mr. Trump wrote into his executive order.

"The exemptions and waiver process that we've put in place are already working exactly as intended," the official said.

The official went on to say that even with the new restrictions and a halt to admissions from a number of countries, the U.S. will still be more open than any other country.

"We're still admitting and processing more people than any other country in the history of civilization. We're still letting in more people from more war-torn regions than any country in the history of civilization," the official said.

Critics have called the new policy a "Muslim ban," citing the majority religion in the countries now on the list of suspended travel.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000254

"Make no mistake — this is a Muslim ban," said Sen. Kamala Harris, a freshman Democrat from California. "Broad brush discrimination against refugees and immigrants from Muslim-majority countries, most of whom are women and children, runs counter to our national security interests, and will likely be used as a terrorist recruitment tool."

The White House, though, has bristled at that characterization, pointing to a list of some 25 Muslim-majority countries that are not affected by the ban.

Airports across the globe have reported chaos, saying they were left in the dark and aren't sure how to handle flights to the U.S. Even at home, officials seemed to struggle with it.

In the lawsuit filed early Saturday on behalf of two men from Iraq who were snared in the ban, one Customs and Border Protection official, after being challenged by lawyers who demanded to know why the men were being held, seemed to acknowledge the confusion.

"Call Mr. Trump," the CBP official told the lawyers, according to the lawsuit.

The senior officials who briefed reporters Saturday afternoon, nearly 24 hours after the ban went into effect, said in order not to let would-be terrorists exploit the system, they couldn't tell everyone what their plans were ahead of time.

"Everybody who needed to know was informed. The rest were being informed in an expeditious fashion," the official said. "It went exactly as it should have gone."

Trump Orders Publication Of Stats On Terror-linked Crime By Foreign Nationals

By Mark Hensch

The Hill, January 27, 2017

President Trump in an executive order he signed Friday tasked top administration officials with providing recurring information about terrorism, gender-based violence and "honor killings."

The order says "the Secretary of Homeland Security, in consultation with the Attorney General, shall, consistent with applicable law and national security" to make the first data available within 180 days.

The directive then states the two Cabinet officials should "every 180 days thereafter" issue new updates about foreign nationals engaged in terrorism and related extremism in the U.S.

Trump's order first seeks "information regarding the number of foreign nationals who have been charged with terrorism-related offenses in the United States."

The measure also applies to those "convicted of terrorism-related offenses," "removed from the United States based on terrorism-related activity," or "material support to a terrorism-related organization."

The order also applies the same criteria to the "number of foreign nationals who have been radicalized after entry into the United States."

The missive's next section, meanwhile, calls for "information regarding the number and types of acts of gender-based violence against women, including 'honor killings,' in the United States by foreign nationals."

Trump's Homeland Security secretary and Attorney General, the order added, can additionally provide "any information relevant to public safety and security" at their own discretion.

Trump vowed while signing Friday's new order it would thoroughly vet refugees to ensure terrorists do not enter the U.S.

"I'm establishing new vetting measures to keep radical Islamic terrorists out of the United States," he said during a ceremony at the Pentagon. "We don't want them here."

"We want to ensure that we are not admitting into our country the very threats our soldiers are fighting overseas. We only want to admit those into our country who support our country and love deeply our people."

The order indicates Trump's administration will indefinitely block refugees from war-torn Syria from entering America.

The directive also suspends all refugee admissions for 120 days while the Trump administration determines which countries pose the least risk.

Democrats have already pounced on the details of Trump's order, arguing it will prolong the suffering of refugees and unfairly target Muslims.

Officials Say Visas Were Being Revoked Prior To Trump's Executive Order

By Safia Samee Ali

NBC News, January 28, 2017

President Donald Trump signed an executive order halting refugee admissions and immigration from certain Arab countries on Friday, but federal officials told NBC News that immigration officers may have been stopping and even banning valid visa holders from returning to the country weeks before the official directive.

Two federal officials familiar with the situation confirmed to NBC News that as many as 40 individuals with F1 student visas, many who left the country for winter break, were told their visas were revoked when they returned stateside to resume classes.

One of the individuals left the country on Jan. 3 and his visa was revoked on Jan. 4, one immigration official confirmed. An official stated that this is highly unusual since the individual had already been put through extensive security vetting prior to his departure.

Related: Trump Travel Restrictions Leave Refugees Stranded: Reports

It's unclear whether the visa issues were directly related to the president's recent executive order, and the circumstances around each case are different. Nonetheless, some are advising caution to international students — particularly those from Iran, Iraq, Syria, Libya, Yemen, Sudan, and Somalia, the seven countries enumerated by Trump as needing "extreme vetting."

"My advice to anyone holding a visa from any of these countries is do not go home because you will not get back in," the official said.

However, the students who ran into visa problems are not from the countries listed in Trump's executive order. Instead, they hold passports from places like Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Turkey, the official added.

Hazami Barmada, a social justice activist and Harvard graduate student who is currently working with four individuals whose F1 student visas were rejected after they returned to American soil, said the students are terrified and scared of coming forward.

"There is definitely a pattern," she said. "Totally unrelated people are saying the same thing happened to them, even down to what they were told by immigration officers."

They are graduate students, some of whom attend Ivy League universities and are well-credentialed, she added. An immigration official confirmed to NBC that at least two students attended Ivy League universities, one on a full scholarship.

Princeton University preemptively issued a notice cautioning its faculty and student body on Friday. "We have strongly advised students and scholars who might be affected and who have travel plans in the coming days to defer travel outside of the United States until there is some clarity and legal analysis of the situation or, if they must travel, to seek legal counsel before they do."

Those with student visas who are in the country are now facing two very difficult scenarios: One where they cannot leave to go home to see loved ones and the other losing their education if they do.

M. A. Majid, an international college student on an F1 visa at the University of Illinois, said he was planning on going back to Jordan to attend his brother's wedding in the summer. His plans have now changed.

"If I want to complete my education, what I spent so much time and money on achieving, I may have to do it at the cost of not seeing my family now," he said. "I don't have a choice anymore."

Another high-ranking federal official verified to NBC News that there was an abnormal increase in complaints by Middle Eastern students who said they were blindsided with visa revocations after arriving in the United States in the week before Trump order.

It's possible that immigration officials saw the tide turning and preemptively applied polices they were anticipating, the official said.

Individuals stopped at immigration were told they have the option of returning to their country voluntarily or face criminal penalties for violating U.S. law, said another federal official. No other explanation was given as it is not legally required, the official said.

"To slap an expedited removal without any question and answer is odd," said Leslie Holman, an immigration attorney and former president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "It seems improper."

In addition to the visa revocation and expedited removal, several individuals were hit with a five-year ban, barring them from re-entering the country, including those who left voluntarily, the official confirmed. People leave voluntarily in order to avoid a ban, but it was put on them anyway, the official said.

"Essentially all valid visas are irrelevant now," the official said. "And they have been before the order."

The Department of Homeland Security did not immediately return a request for comment. A State Department spokesperson said the department was prohibited from commenting on individual visa cases.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The American Association of Immigration Lawyers also advised caution. In a statement released one day before Trump's executive order, the group said to "consider advising clients who might be affected by the Executive Order to refrain from traveling outside of the United States if they are already here, or try to return to the United States as soon as possible if they are outside of the country."

Since Trump's order does not define what it means to be "from a country," the order should be read to include "passport holders, citizens, nationals, dual nationals, etc." "in an abundance of caution," the statement added.

Trump's Order Blocks Immigrants At Airports, Stoking Fear Around Globe

By Michael D. Shear And Nicholas Kulish

President Trump's executive order on immigration quickly reverberated through the United States and across the globe on Saturday, slamming the border shut for an Iranian scientist headed to a lab in Boston, an Iraqi who had worked for a decade as an interpreter for the United States Army, and a Syrian refugee family headed to a new life in Ohio, among countless others.

Around the nation, security officers at major international gateways had new rules to follow, though the application of the order appeared uneven. Humanitarian organizations scrambled to cancel long-planned programs, delivering the bad news to families who were about to travel. Refugees who were on flights when the order was signed were detained at airports.

"We've gotten reports of people being detained all over the country," said Becca Heller, the director of the International Refugee Assistance Project. "They're literally pouring in by the minute."

There were numerous reports of students attending American universities who were blocked from returning to the United States from visits abroad. One student said in a Twitter post that he would be unable to study at Yale. Another who attends the Massachusetts Institute of Technology was refused permission to board a plane. A Sudanese student at Stanford University was blocked for hours from returning to California.

Human rights groups reported that legal permanent residents of the United States who hold green cards were being stopped in foreign airports as they sought to return from funerals, vacations or study abroad.

The president's order, enacted with the stroke of a pen at 4:42 on Friday afternoon, suspended entry of all refugees to the United States for 120 days, barred Syrian refugees indefinitely, and blocked entry into the United States for 90 days for citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen.

The Department of Homeland Security said that the executive order also barred green card holders from those countries from re-entering the United States. In a briefing for reporters on Saturday, White House officials said that green card holders from the seven affected countries who are outside the United States would need a case-by-case waiver to return to the United States.

Legal residents who have a green card and are currently in the United States should meet with a consular officer before leaving the country, a White House official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, told reporters. Officials did not clarify the criteria that would qualify someone for a waiver from the president's executive order, which says only that one can be granted when it is "in the national interest."

But the week-old administration appeared to be implementing the order chaotically, with agencies and officials around the globe interpreting it in different ways.

The Stanford student, a legal permanent resident of the United States with a green card, was held at Kennedy International Airport in New York for about eight hours but was eventually allowed to fly to California, said Lisa Lapin, a Stanford spokeswoman. Others who were detained appeared to be still in custody or sent back to their home countries.

White House aides claimed on Saturday that there had been talks with officials at the State Department and the Department of Homeland Security over the past several weeks about carrying out the order. "Everyone who needed to know was informed," one aide said.

But that assertion was denied by multiple officials with knowledge of the interactions, including two officials at the State Department. Two of the officials said leaders of Customs and Border Protection and Citizenship and Immigration Services — the two agencies most directly affected by the order — and other agencies were on a telephone briefing on the new policy even as Mr. Trump signed it on Friday.

At least one case prompted a legal challenge as lawyers representing two Iraqi refugees held at Kennedy Airport filed a motion early Saturday seeking to have their clients released. They also filed a motion for class certification, in an effort to represent all refugees and other immigrants who they said were being unlawfully detained at ports of entry.

Shortly after noon on Saturday, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, the interpreter who worked on behalf of the United States government in Iraq, was released. After nearly 19 hours of detention, Mr. Darweesh began to cry as he spoke to reporters, putting his hands behind his back and miming handcuffs.

"What I do for this country? They put the cuffs on," Mr. Darweesh said. "You know how many soldiers I touch by this hand?"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The other man the lawyers are representing, Haider Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, remained in custody as his legal advocates sought his release.

Inside the airport, one of the lawyers, Mark Doss, a supervising attorney at the International Refugee Assistance Project, asked a border agent, "Who is the person we need to talk to?"

"Call Mr. Trump," said the agent, who declined to identify himself.

The White House said the restrictions would protect "the United States from foreign nationals entering from countries compromised by terrorism" and ensure "a more rigorous vetting process." But critics condemned Mr. Trump over the immediate collateral damage imposed on people who, by all accounts, had no sinister intentions in trying to come to the United States.

Peaceful protests began forming Saturday afternoon at Kennedy Airport, where nine travelers had been detained upon arrival at Terminal 7 and two others at Terminal 4, an airport official said.

The official said they were being held in a federal area of the airport, adding that such situations were playing out around the nation.

An official message to all American diplomatic posts around the world provided instructions about how to treat people from the countries affected: "Effective immediately, halt interviewing and cease issuance and printing" of visas to the United States.

Internationally, confusion turned to panic as travelers found themselves unable to board flights bound for the United States. In Dubai and Istanbul, airport and immigration officials turned passengers away at boarding gates and, in at least one case, ejected a family from a flight they had boarded.

Seyed Soheil Saeedi Saravi, a promising young Iranian scientist, had been scheduled to travel in the coming days to Boston, where he had been awarded a fellowship to study cardiovascular medicine at Harvard, according to Thomas Michel, the professor who was to supervise the research fellowship.

But Professor Michel said the visas for the student and his wife had been indefinitely suspended.

"This outstanding young scientist has enormous potential to make contributions that will improve our understanding of heart disease, and he has already been thoroughly vetted," Professor Michel wrote to The New York Times.

Peter McPherson, the president of the Association of Public and Land-grant Universities, which represents many of the biggest public colleges in the country, said he was "deeply concerned" about the new policy. He said it was "causing significant disruption and hardship" for students, researchers, faculty and staff members.

A Syrian family of six who have been living in a Turkish refugee camp since fleeing their home in 2014 had been scheduled to arrive in Cleveland on Tuesday, according to a report in The Cleveland Plain Dealer. Instead, the family's trip has been called off.

Danielle Drake, a community relations manager at US Together, a refugee resettlement agency, told the newspaper that Mr. Trump's ban reminded her of when the United States turned away Jewish refugees during World War II. "All those times that people said, 'Never again,' well, we're doing it again," she said.

On Twitter, Daniel W. Drezner, a professor at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University in Medford, Mass., posted an angry message for Mr. Trump after the executive order stopped the arrival of a Syrian family his synagogue had sponsored.

In an interview on Friday night on "The Rachel Maddow Show" on MSNBC, he expressed sorrow for the fate of the family and apologized for cursing in his Twitter message.

"I can't quite describe the degree of anger that I felt as a reaction to this, which then caused me to curse at the president on social media," he said, adding, "which is probably something I should not do as a general rule."

It was unclear how many refugees and other immigrants were being held nationwide in relation to the executive order.

A Christian family of six from Syria said in an email to Representative Charlie Dent, Republican of Pennsylvania, that they were being detained at Philadelphia International Airport on Saturday morning despite having legal paperwork, green cards and visas that had been approved.

In the case of the two Iraqis held at Kennedy Airport, the legal filings by his lawyers say that Mr. Darweesh was granted a special immigrant visa on Jan. 20, the same day Mr. Trump was sworn in as president. Mr. Darweesh worked with the Americans in Iraq in a variety of jobs — as an engineer, a contractor and an interpreter for the Army's 101st Airborne Division in Baghdad and Mosul starting shortly after the invasion of Iraq on April 1, 2003.

A husband and father of three, he arrived at Kennedy Airport with his family. Mr. Darweesh's wife and children made it through passport control and customs, but agents of Customs and Border Protection detained him.

In Istanbul, during a stopover on Saturday, passengers reported that security officers had entered a plane after everyone had boarded and ordered a young Iranian woman and her family to leave the aircraft.

Iranian green card holders who live in the United States were blindsided by the decree while on vacation in Iran, finding themselves in a legal limbo and unsure whether they would be able to return to America.

"How do I get back home now?" said Daria Zeynalia, a green card holder who was visiting family in Iran. He had rented a house and leased a car, and would be eligible for citizenship in November. "What about my job? If I can't go back soon, I'll lose everything."

Trump Order On Refugees, Muslims Sparks Confusion, Worry

By Alicia A. Caldwell

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – Confusion, worry and outrage grew Saturday as President Donald Trump's crackdown on refugees and citizens from seven majority-Muslim countries took effect. Airlines blocked people traveling to the United States, legal challenges were underway and doubts abounded about whether the order would make America safer.

The immediate fallout from Trump's order meant that an untold number of foreign-born U.S. residents now traveling outside the U.S. could be stuck overseas for at least 90 days – despite holding permanent residency "green cards" or other visas. And some foreign nationals who were allowed to board flights before the order was signed Friday were being detained at U.S. airports, told they were no longer welcome.

Trump billed his sweeping executive order as a necessary step to stop "radical Islamic terrorists" from coming to the U.S. Included is a 90-day ban on travel to the U.S. by citizens of Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia or Yemen and a 120-day suspension of the U.S. refugee program.

Trump's order singled out Syrians for the most aggressive ban, indefinitely blocking entry for anyone from that country, including those fleeing civil war.

The directive did not do anything to prevent attacks from homegrown extremists who were already in America, a primary concern of federal law enforcement officials. It also omitted Saudi Arabia, home to most of the Sept. 11 hijackers.

As a candidate Trump pledged to temporarily ban Muslims from coming to the U.S., then said he would implement "extreme vetting" for people from countries with significant terror concerns.

Trump told reporters Saturday the order is "not a Muslim ban."

"It's working out very nicely," Trump said of the implementation of his order. "We're going to have a very, very strict ban and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years."

The order drew criticism from U.S. lawmakers and officials around the globe.

Sen. Ben Sasse, a Nebraska Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said while Trump is right to focus on border security, the order is "too broad."

"If we send a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. sees all Muslims as jihadis, the terrorist recruiters win by telling kids that America is banning Muslims and that this is America versus one religion," Sasse said. "Our generational fight against jihadism requires wisdom."

In Tehran, Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif said Iran would stop issuing new visas to U.S. citizens in response to Trump's ban, but that anyone already with a visa to Iran wouldn't be turned away.

Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau took to Twitter Saturday afternoon to say that refugees were welcome in Canada, "regardless of your faith."

Two of the first people blocked from entering the United States were Iraqis with links to the U.S. military.

Hameed Khalid Darweesh and Haider Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi were detained by immigration officials after landing at New York's Kennedy airport Friday night. Darweesh had worked as an interpreter for the U.S. Army when it invaded Iraq in 2003. Later he worked as a contract engineer. He was allowed into the U.S. Saturday afternoon, hours after his attorney petitioned a federal court to let the two men go.

In their court filing, his lawyers said Alshawai's wife had worked for a U.S. security contractor in Iraq. Members of her family had been killed by insurgents because of their association with the U.S. military.

The government can exempt foreign nationals from the ban if their entry is deemed in the national interest. But it was not immediately clear how that exemption might be applied.

Diplomats from the seven countries singled out by Trump's order would still be allowed into the U.S.

Those already in the U.S. with a visa or green card would be allowed to stay, according to the official, who wasn't authorized to publicly discuss the details of how Trump's order was being put in place and spoke only on condition of anonymity.

Trump's order also directed U.S. officials to review information as needed to fully vet foreigners asking to come to the U.S. and draft a list of countries that don't provide that information. That left open the possibility that citizens of other countries could also face a travel ban.

The U.S. may still admit refugees on a case-by-case basis during the freeze, and the government would continue to process requests from people claiming religious persecution, "provided that the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations said it would challenge the constitutionality of Trump's order.

"There is no evidence that refugees – the most thoroughly vetted of all people entering our nation – are a threat to national security," said Lena F. Masri, the group's national litigation director. "This is an order that is based on bigotry, not reality."

John Cohen, a former Department of Homeland Security counterterrorism official who worked under Democratic and Republican administrations, said the order didn't address America's "primary terrorism-related threat" – people already in the U.S. who become inspired by what they see on the internet.

Trump's order drew support from some Republican lawmakers who have urged more security measures for the refugee vetting program, particularly for those from Syria.

"We are a compassionate nation and a country of immigrants. But as we know, terrorists are dead set on using our immigration and refugee programs as a Trojan Horse to attack us," House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Michael McCaul said in a statement Friday. "With the stroke of a pen, he is doing more to shut down terrorist pathways into this country than the last administration did in eight years."

It is unclear how many people would be immediately impacted by the non-refugee travel ban. According to the statistics maintained by the Homeland Security Department, about 17,000 students from the seven designated countries were allowed into the U.S. for the 2015-2016 school year. In 2015 more than 86,000 people from those countries arrived in the U.S. on other, non-immigrant visas and more than 52,000 others became legal permanent residents.

Last year the U.S. resettled 85,000 people displaced by war, political oppression, hunger and religious prejudice, including more than 12,000 Syrians. Before leaving office President Barack Obama announced that the U.S. would accept 110,000 refugees in the coming year, but Trump's order cut that by more than half to 50,000.

No refugees were in the air when the travel ban was signed Friday, but about 350 people were in transit in Nairobi, Kenya, and were now stuck there, said Melanie Nezer, vice president of policy and advocacy for HIAS, a refugee resettlement aid agency. She said several hundred more people who were booked on U.S.-bound flights in the next week were now stranded around the globe.

"This in effect could be a permanent ban," she said. "Many of these people may never be able to come."

'How Do I Get Back Home?' Iranians Turned Away From Flights To U.S.

By Thomas Erdbrink

New York Times, January 28, 2017

As Iranians woke on Saturday to the news that none of them would be able to enter the United States for at least 90 days, on the orders of President Trump, panic reigned.

They were turned back from flights to the United States in Tehran and in the major transfer hubs of Istanbul and Dubai. Some of those who arrived in the United States after midnight, when the decree went into effect, were held or deported, rights groups and airline representatives said.

No one, not passengers, airline representatives or even United States border control officials, seemed to know how to interpret the executive order that went into effect at midnight on Friday. Under the new policy, refugees, immigrants and almost anyone from seven countries deemed to be hotbeds of terrorism are banned from the United States for 90 days, pending a review of policies.

Officials are just interpreting the directive by themselves, said one representative for an international airline who was based in Tehran. He said the airline did not know if Iranians could fly to the United States or not.

On Saturday, three international airlines shuttling passengers between Iran and the United States — Emirates, Lufthansa and Qatar Airways — had stopped allowing Iranians with visas or even permanent residence cards to board their planes. The Qatar Airways office in Tehran confirmed that all Iranian passengers without United States passports were stopped from flying to the United States on Friday evening and sent back to Iran.

In Istanbul, during a stopover on Saturday, passengers reported that security officers had entered a plane after everybody boarded and ordered a young Iranian woman and her family to leave the aircraft.

Holders of green cards, which confer the right to live and work indefinitely in the United States, received conflicting information about whether or not they would be permitted to return to the United States. But on Saturday, the Department of Homeland Security clarified the executive order, saying it applied even to permanent residents from the seven Muslim-majority countries named in the ban: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen.

"It will bar green card holders," Gillian Christensen, the Department of Homeland Security's acting spokeswoman, told Reuters.

Many were blindsided by the decree while on vacation in Iran. "How do I get back home now?" said Daria Zeynalia, a green card holder who was visiting family in Iran. He had rented a house and leased a car and would be eligible for citizenship in November. "What about my job? If I can't go back soon, I'll lose everything," he said.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

It is unclear how many Iranians have green cards, but experts say the number runs into the hundreds of thousands.

In an online survey tracking entry challenges, two out of 112 passengers holding green cards said they were not allowed into the United States, but the reasons were unclear. Card holders can be barred, for instance, if they owe back taxes.

Others spent years preparing to study in the United States only to see their plans abruptly thwarted on Friday. About 4,000 Iranians are granted study visas to attend American universities each year, often after a long and complicated process that can take years.

Shadi Heidarifar, a philosophy student just admitted to New York University, said in a message on Twitter that she had spent three years trying to apply to universities in the United States.

"I had to work to save money, gather documents. The application fees were so expensive that a whole family could live for a month" on them, Ms. Heidarifar wrote. When she was accepted recently, she was over the moon. "But now my entire future is destroyed in one second."

'These Are People's Lives They Are Playing With': World's Airports Turn Into Limbo For Many Under Trump Order

By Kareem Fahim, Mustafa Salim

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

After working as an interpreter for an American security company in Iraq and enduring years of background checks after applying for a U.S. visa, Labeeb Ali's hopes of moving to the United States ended abruptly in Qatar's international airport on Saturday, when officials prevented him from boarding a flight to Texas.

"I have the visa in my passport," he said hours later, after he had stopped yelling at the airport staff and his rage had given way to despair and regret at having already sold his business and belongings in Iraq.

"They have killed my dream," he said. "They took it all away from me, in the last minutes."

President Trump's order on Friday to temporarily ban citizens of several Muslim countries from entering the United States sowed panic, confusion and anguish in airports across the globe Saturday, as nationals of the affected countries were either barred by airlines from traveling or detained upon arrival in the United States.

Those prevented from boarding U.S.-bound planes included Iraqis like Ali, who said he had been granted a special immigration visa on Jan. 24 reserved for interpreters and translators who had worked for American forces in Iraq or Afghanistan. Others had fled war in Yemen or Syria or repression in Sudan or Iran. Taken together, Saturday's restrictions amounted to another cruel trial for people who had escaped conflict and overcame the hurdles to win coveted American visas, only to be turned back on what should have been the final leg of their journeys.

Countless others were left in a paralyzing limbo as they struggled to understand the president's edict. They included Syrian students granted admission in American universities and facing the certainty that they would not be able to attend, and Iraqi or Iranian green-card holders traveling abroad and terrified at the possibility that they would not be able to return home.

Sarah Amer, an Iraqi who lives in New York, had left her daughter at home and was visiting friends in Iraq when Trump signed the executive order. "They can't just change the rules in one night," she said Saturday, amid confusion about whether green-card holders from Iraq could return to the United States.

"These are people's lives they are playing with," she said.

The executive order, titled "Protecting the Nation from Foreign Terrorist Entry into the United States," bars citizens from Syria, Iran, Iraq, Yemen, Sudan, Somalia and Libya, all predominantly Muslim nations, from entering the United States for the next 90 days. The order also indefinitely bars Syrian refugees from resettling in the United States and suspends the entry of all refugees from any country for 120 days.

The order followed Trump's repeated campaign pledges to restrict Muslim immigration to the United States. But the speed with which it was promulgated — a week after the president took office — still caught those most affected by surprise.

The confusion extended to airlines, which issued contradictory or vague rules about who would be allowed to fly. Lufthansa, the German carrier, released a statement saying it was "obliged by law to strictly adhere to U.S. immigration requirements." But, reflecting the uncertainty over the American directive, the airline said only that citizens of the affected countries "might not be accepted onboard U.S. flights."

Qatar Airways said that passengers would be allowed to travel only if they were permanent green-card holders or had visas that were exempt from the order.

Manel Vrijenhoek, a spokeswoman for KLM, the Dutch carrier, said "It's not 100 percent clear who is allowed in and who is not." The airline had barred seven passengers from traveling to the United States on Saturday, she said, after informing them "that there is no use in flying to the U.S. because you will be rejected. You won't even be able to leave the plane."

She would not to say which country the passengers had come from, only that they were from one of the seven countries named in the presidential order.

Ali, the Iraqi citizen, said that two Syrians were also prevented from traveling on his flight to Texas. In Egypt, security officials stopped five Iraqis and a Yemeni national from boarding a flight to New York. There were unconfirmed reports that Iranian visitors as well as permanent green-card holders were restricted from traveling to the United States by officials at airports in Amsterdam, Abu Dhabi as well as Qatar, according to Hazhir Rahmandad, an Iranian American professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who created a crowdsourced database to track Iranian travelers affected by the ban.

Although the details in the database could not be independently verified, the reports also suggested scores of Iranian visitors and green-card holders were also being turned away at several U.S. airports upon arrival.

The data and reports so far "suggest there is confusion among border agents about how to treat" the various categories of visa holders, Rahmandad said.

And there was consternation for Iranians who received the news while on the road. On Saturday, Ali Abdi, a 30-year-old Iranian green-card holder who studies at Yale University, was in transit in Dubai, on his way to Afghanistan to do research for his doctoral thesis, but he was suddenly worried that Trump's directive had left him stranded.

He had received reports from friends and acquaintances that green-card holders were subject to the ban. Abdi, a human rights activist who claimed asylum in the United States in 2011, said he would not be able to return to Iran if he was denied reentry to the U.S.

"I'll be stateless," he said. "I left Iran eight years ago, and I have been looking for a home. I don't think of the U.S. as that kind of place anymore," he said.

Abed Ayoub, the legal director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, an advocacy group that was counseling citizens from the affected countries, said the majority of the calls the group had received were from people overseas wondering whether they should even bother boarding a plane. They included an Iraqi woman who was flying to visit her family in the United States but at the last minute decided to go to Canada instead.

Calls had also come from citizens of countries that were not affected by the ban, including Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Morocco — part of what Ayoub called a broader "chilling effect" the presidential order had imposed across the Muslim world.

The group had advised the callers to double-check the latest rules before they begin their travels. "That list can be expanded at any point," Ayoub said. "You want to be aware before you board the plane."

When Fuad Sharef and his family landed at Cairo airport Saturday morning, they were clutching boarding passes for their connecting flight to New York and valid one-year visas to the United States. They were headed, eventually, to Nashville, to start a new life.

But soon after they entered the terminal, Egyptian airport authorities stopped them and ordered them to hand over their passports. They informed him that the American Embassy in Baghdad had sent a communique saying the family could no longer travel on to the United States.

"They didn't explain why," said Sharef, 51, who spoke by phone because he and his family were inside the transit section of the terminal and were not allowed to leave. "But I knew this was because of the executive order signed by Donald Trump."

He was traveling with his wife, Arazoo, 41; his son Bnyad, 19; his daughter Yad, 17; and another daughter, Shad, 10.

Like many Iraqis wanting to resettle in the United States, Sharef took advantage of a program to assist Iraqis who worked for the U.S. government and American media in Iraq. Sharef had worked for Research Triangle Institute (RTI), a USAID subcontractor, for several years after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, first as translator and later running a program that gave out microbusiness loans to Iraqis.

Working for the Americans was filled with perils, he said. He and other colleagues faced death threats — he knew co-workers who were kidnapped or killed. His work and background swayed the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, and after two years of vetting, they deemed him safe enough to be resettled in the United States.

Sharef sold his house, his car and all his remaining possessions. He pulled his three children out of their schools. He spent $5,000 for air tickets and quit his job as a supply-chain manager for a large pharmaceutical firm. He was confident he would find an opportunity in Nashville, with his three degrees, including an MBA.

Sharef admits that he took a gamble. When he heard of Trump's impending visa ban, he pushed their trip to the United States forward by a few days. The family is now scheduled to be placed on a flight back to Irbil on Sunday morning — after spending the night inside the airport terminal.

"Donald Trump destroyed my life," said Sharef. "How can he do this to people who risked their lives to help America?"

Despair, Confusion Reign As Trump's Travel Ban Hits

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

An Iraqi pleaded for his life to President Donald Trump. A longtime New Yorker, born in Syria, wondered how he would get home from a trip abroad. Church groups, geared up to welcome refugee families, looked in dismay at homes prepared for families that may never arrive.

Despair and confusion set in Saturday among citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries who found themselves abruptly unable to enter the United States a day after Trump signed an order he billed as a necessary step to stop "radical Islamic terrorists" from coming to the U.S.

Included is a 90-day ban on travel to the U.S. by citizens of Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia or Yemen and a 120-day suspension of the U.S. refugee program.

Travelers from those nations were either barred from getting on their flights or detained at U.S. airports after they landed, including tourists, foreign students and people trying to visit friends and family.

"What's next? What's going to happen next?" asked Mohammed al Rawi, an Iraqi-born American citizen in the Los Angeles area, after his 69-year-old father, coming to visit his grandchildren in California, was abruptly detained and sent back to Iraq after 12 hours in custody. "Are they going to create camps for Muslims and put us in it?"

After an appeal from civil liberties lawyers, a federal judge in New York issued an emergency order Saturday night barring the U.S. from summarily deporting people who had arrived with valid visas or an approved refugee application.

U.S. District Judge Ann Donnelly said travelers had a strong argument that their legal rights had been violated. Her order, though, only affected a portion of Trump's order.

That ruling came as protests broke out at several U.S. airports where travelers were being held, including a gathering of several hundred people outside San Francisco's main airport and a raucous demonstration of at least 2,000 people at New York's Kennedy International Airport.

Hameed Khalid Darweesh, a translator and assistant for the U.S. military in Iraq for 10 years now fleeing death threats, was among at least a dozen people detained at New York's Kennedy airport their arrivals Friday and Saturday.

He walked free midday Friday after his lawyers and two members of congress went to the airport to try and gain his release.

"This is the soul of America," Darweesh told a crowd of demonstrators and reporters, adding that the U.S. was home to "the greatest people in the world."

Others were less lucky. Parisa Fasihianifard, 24, arrived after a long trip from Tehran, Iran, only to be detained and told she had to go home.

"She was crying and she told me she was banned to come inside and go through the gates," said her husband Mohamad Zandian , 26, an Iranian doctoral student at Ohio State University. He was hoping to get her out of the country on a late night flight to avoid her being jailed until Monday.

Staff at U.S. agencies that resettle refugees were scrambling to analyze the order and girded for the wrenching phone calls that would have to be made to the thousands of refugees just days away from traveling to the U.S. Several staff who spoke to the AP burst into tears as they contemplated the future for people who had waited years to come into the country.

"It's complete chaos," said Melanie Nezer, policy director for HIAS, one of nine refugee resettlement agencies that work with the U.S. State Department.

The International Refugee Assistance Project, which aids foreign nationals targeted for their work for the U.S. government as well as other refugees, was sending the same message to asylum-seekers, most of them who had been waiting for years.

Meathaq Alaunaibi, also a refugee from Iraq, was hoping to soon be reunited with her twin 18-year-old daughters who are in Baghdad. Alaunaibi, her husband, a son and another daughter were settled last August in Tennessee, as the twins completed their government review to enter the U.S. After Trump signed the order, she spoke by phone with her daughters.

"They are so worried and afraid because they're stuck there in Baghdad," Alaunaibi said Saturday. "They are young and they are strong, but I am crying all the time. I miss them."

An Iraqi in Mosul, an Iraqi city where the Islamic State group had seized control, despaired at word that what he had thought was an imminent flight to safety in America was now canceled, indefinitely.

"If you can write to Mr. Trump or find any other way to help me reunite with my family, please, I am dying in Iraq, please," the man, whose identity was withheld because he is still in danger in Iraq, wrote back to his U.S. lawyer by email.

The order also caused confusion for longtime, legal U.S. residents traveling abroad.

Kinan Azmeh, a clarinetist born in Syria who has lived in the U.S. for 16 years, left his home in New York City three weeks ago for a series of concerts that included a date with cellist Yo-Yo Ma. Now, he doesn't know if he will be able to return home.

"I don't know what's going on," Azmeh told The Associated Press by phone Saturday from Lebanon. "It is home as much as Damascus," he said of New York City. "I really don't know how to react."

Before Trump signed the order, more than 67,000 refugees had been approved by the federal government to enter the U.S., said Jen Smyers, refugee policy director for Church World Service. More than 6,400 had already been booked on flights, including 15 families that had been expected over the next few weeks in the Chicago area from Ethiopia, Eritrea, Iran, Syria and Uganda.

The bulk of refugees entering the U.S. are settled by religious groups, who organize churches, synagogues and mosques to collect furniture, clothes and toys for the refugees and set up volunteer schedules for hosting duties. All that work ground to a halt after Trump signed the order.

In Massachusetts, Jewish Family Service of MetroWest had been coordinating a group of doctors, community leaders, a local mosque and other volunteers to resettle 15 Syrian families, including a 1-year-old and 5-year-old who arrived Tuesday.

Now, two fully outfitted apartments remain empty and it's unclear when, if ever, the other refugees will be allowed to enter, said Marc Jacobs, chief executive of the Jewish service group.

Nour Ulayyet of Valparaiso, Indiana said her sister, a Syrian living in Saudi Arabia, was sent back after arriving from Riyadh at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport on Saturday and told she couldn't enter the U.S. to help care for their sick mother. Ulayyet said some officials at the airport were apologizing to her sister, who had a valid visa.

"My mom was already having pain enough to go through this on top of the pain that she's having," Ulayyet said.

An Iraqi Family Split By The Vicissitudes Of Asylum

By John Otis And Rana F. Sweis

Maha al-Obaidi's family is divided.

She immigrated to New York City in 2014, reuniting with her three sons who had arrived earlier. She expected that her husband, Husham al-Qadhi, and her two other sons would soon join her from Amman, Jordan, finally bringing the family together after a tumultuous decade of surviving the Iraq war, fleeing to Jordan and then searching for a permanent home.

But on Friday, the family was dealt another blow, after President Trump approved a sweeping executive order on immigration that, among other things, blocked entry into the United States for 90 days for citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries including Iraq, where members of the family are citizens. Her husband and two sons in Jordan are for now locked out of the United States, and Ms. Obaidi cannot travel away, or risk being denied re-entry.

"Now our family in the U.S. can't even come to visit us, nor can we visit them," Mr. Qadhi said on Saturday in Amman. "We just sit and watch like the rest of the world what is happening, and our fate is being decided for us, in front of our eyes."

The family lived in Baghdad as American tanks, troops and missiles tore into the Iraqi capital in 2003. It stayed for several years, despite gunfire and bomb blasts outside its house and the kidnapping of several family members. The family helped American soldiers even though other Iraqis targeted it for doing so.

One of the sons in Amman, Thabit al-Qadhi, said he and his father had run a snack bar on an American base in Baghdad, serving candy and soft drinks to troops, and operated a 24-hour internet cafe, which required them to be vetted and approved to begin work.

After Thabit al-Qadhi was kidnapped in 2006 by Qaeda terrorists and eventually released, he said, he reported details about the episode to American officials in the hope that they would be caught. And on his way home from the Baghdad base one day, he came upon four American troops injured along the road, and he said he had loaded them into his car and driven them to the Green Zone.

"America has abandoned its responsibility to protect those who protected and cooperated with the Americans," he said. "It's a decision solely based on my religious faith. It's discrimination solely on religious grounds."

He added: "This is the wrong decision. Is it even constitutional?"

The family's home was along one of Baghdad's major highways, an entry point for American troops during the invasion. The family huddled in a windowless section of the home for 10 days, as bullets shattered windows and rockets blazed through the sky, until the United States took control of Baghdad.

In the years after the invasion, the family remained in Iraq, even as unrest spread, militants took up arms and centuries-old tensions between Sunnis and Shiites flared up.

In addition to Thabit al-Qadhi, Ms. Obaidi's husband was also kidnapped, on two separate occasions. The family members recalled the lengths to which they went to get them freed, how they stuffed $60,000 in Iraqi dinars into garbage bags and were instructed by cellphone to travel to a series of locations before dropping off the ransom.

"It was like in the movies," Ms. Obaidi said in an interview this month.

Fearing more attacks, the family left Iraq for Jordan. It joined many other Iraqi refugees, including extended family members. Ms. Obaidi and her husband used their savings to buy a home in Amman. Employment opportunities were scarce for Iraqis, leading three of her sons, starting in 2010, to venture to the United States to find work.

When Ms. Obaidi later followed them, she hoped that her entire family could apply for asylum and unite in America. She made the trip despite a number of concerns.

"At first, I felt afraid," she said. "How can I live in this country? It is a foreign country. It is very far from my culture. How will I be compatible with the community?"

To her surprise, Ms. Obaidi found New York to be unlike its gruff stereotypes. People smiled as she walked down the street. Men helped her haul heavy bags up stairs. Others offered her seats on the subway.

"Everybody in America is very nice," she said. "They are very polite, helpful people, nice people, always with a smile on their face. That is my experience."

She has found additional support from the International Rescue Committee, a global humanitarian aid, relief and development nongovernmental organization based in New York. Founded in 1933, the organization is the newest organization supported by The New York Times Neediest Cases Fund, and the only one of the eight groups whose work extends beyond the New York area. It operates in 29 cities in the United States and in more than 40 countries.

The organization was instrumental in helping Ms. Obaidi adjust to her new life and connecting her with a number of social services, including health insurance and food stamps. It helped her obtain a Social Security card, navigate New York's streets and understand its transportation system. The group also helped her study for her driver's license permit exam, among other services.

"I feel I am not lonely," she said. "I have somebody. I have somebody to support me."

She shares a home in the Astoria neighborhood in Queens with two of her sons, Saif al-Qadhi and Qaed al-Qadhi. Her third son, Tameem al-Kadhi, and his wife, Melissa Forstrom, also live in the neighborhood.

"I have a nice life," Ms. Obaidi said. "Even though my apartment is small, I feel happy in it. I like it."

But it is a home with some notable, painful absences. "I've divided myself," Ms. Obaidi said. "Some part is there in Jordan, and some parts …" She trailed off, overcome with emotion.

In Amman, Thabit al-Qadhi, her oldest son, lives with his wife and 5-year-old son across the street from Ms. Obaidi's husband, Husham, and their youngest son, Omar al-Qadhi. They have been denied asylum in the United States.

In October 2015, Husham al-Qadhi was sent a conditional acceptance letter for asylum in the United States. About a year later, he received a second letter, denying him resettlement. Omar al-Qadhi, who works at Unicef to help provide water, sanitation and hygiene to Syrian refugees in Jordan, was also denied resettlement.

"We have lived here as if we were waiting for something, as if everything was temporary, but now we no longer know what we are waiting for," Omar al-Qadhi said in his apartment in Amman.

Thabit al-Qadhi, who has traveled to New York several times to visit his family, has not received the same denial letters for resettlement in the United States. His tourist visa was renewed, but a week later, an officer at the American Embassy in Amman told him that his visa had been canceled, and his case for resettlement was denied.

Whether they will ever get approval to move to the United States is even more uncertain now. Thabit al-Qadhi said that Mr. Trump's order was particularly painful and that he felt America was turning its back on Iraqis who had risked their lives to help soldiers during the war.

"At the end we realized we were no longer welcome, neither from the Iraqis because we worked with the Americans, nor from the Americans because we were Iraqi," he said.

Like many Iraqis, Thabit al-Qadhi is living in Jordan on a conditional basis. He must renew his permission every year, and it is dependent on the family's financial means.

"Nothing is guaranteed in business," he said. "Today, my trade company here is successful, but if one day the business fails, then what will happen? Where do I go?"

In the United States, his siblings, even with employment and legal immigration status, live in a similar state of unsteadiness and concern.

For three years, Tameem al-Kadhi's only proof of his legal status was an arrival-departure record known as an I-94 form, a document without a photo of him and only his name and identification numbers. It has hindered his attempts to travel even within the United States. Visas for Saif al-Qadhi's wife and children were approved recently after a wait of more than two years. They were booked on a plane expected to arrive Feb. 7, but Friday's executive order by Mr. Trump has dashed those plans.

"The kids, they grow up far from their father," Saif al-Qadhi said. "All of a sudden, I told them 'I'm sorry, something changed. I may not be able to see you soon.'"

He and his wife are distraught by the development, which leaves them in a precarious position. In anticipation of the move, their children were taken out of their private school and the lease on their apartment in Amman is to expire on Feb. 1.

"I'm watching the news every second," Mr. Qadhi said.

Ms. Obaidi's children have been able to acclimate to their new surroundings and establish a rhythm in their lives. Tameem al-Kadhi owns a cellphone store in the East Village in Manhattan, Qaed al-Qadhi works as an information technology manager, and Saif al-Qadhi is an Uber driver. Ms. Obaidi stays busy by volunteering at the Masjid Dar Al-Dawah mosque.

The family gathers as often as work schedules and other responsibilities allow, most often on Sundays, when Ms. Obaidi prepares a large meal. They all await the day when more chairs can be placed around the table.

Halfway across the world, the other half of the family shares that sentiment. Omar al-Qadhi said he missed his brothers, but especially his mother. "It just feels weird that we are now split, and the future looks grim," he said. "We are travelers on a journey with no destination, and my family is so far away."

Families Divided By Trump's Refugee Order Worry About The Future

By Harriet Ryan And Melissa Etehad, Contact Reporters

Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2017

Ali Abdi, a 30-year-old student from Iran, has been studying for his PhD in anthropology at Yale University. Last week, he left the U.S. for the United Arab Emirates on his way to a research trip in Afghanistan.

That was only days before President Trump issued his executive order on Friday suspending admissions from seven majority Muslim countries, including Iran.

Now Abdi, who has been living in the U.S. for the last four years, is unsure what to do. He cannot return to Iran, where he faces potential imprisonment for his political activism. His visa for the UAE won't allow him to stay there long, nor does he have permission for an extended stay in Afghanistan.

Most seriously, under Trump's new order, he can no longer return to the U.S. to finish his studies.

Abdi is trying to be philosophical. "I'm not worried about anything... From an anthropological perspective I can write a lot," he said in a telephone interview Saturday. "What has happened is very illuminating. The main problem is the lives of thousands of others who are torn apart by what happened."

The executive order signed on Friday suspends all refugee entries for 120 days, blocks Syrian refugees and bars for 90 days the entry of citizens from Iraq, Iran, Syria, Yemen, Sudan, Libya and Somalia.

Around the world, students and workers caught outside the U.S. were uncertain when they would be allowed to return under the new executive order. Refugees expecting safe resettlement in the U.S. were stranded and detained at airports. And families whose loved ones were stranded abroad were left in a state of crippling anxiety.

Many were scanning their social media feeds or watching television, trying to make sense of the new policy and understand what happens next.

Bahareh Aslani, a 34-year-old Iranian American, has been planning to have a formal wedding ceremony in Baltimore in April to celebrate her marriage to her husband, Mostapha Roudsari, who teaches at the University of Pennsylvania.

Roudsari's parents, who live in Iran, went to Dubai in December and applied for a visa to enter the U.S., waiting 2 ½ months for an appointment at the U.S. embassy. The couple was told that the mother's visa had been approved and that the father's visa had been approved, pending additional documents.

Now, both are barred from entry and will not be able to attend the wedding and are devastated, Aslani said.

"It's frustrating, most of all. Makes me sad for my in laws and family, but mostly I'm really scared, because is this the beginning? Are they going to come after me? Once you start the slippery slope to losing all your basic rights, and no one seems to know what to do about it," Aslani said.

Nobar Elmi Golhar, 36, lives in Brooklyn and has never been to Iran, but worries about whether her family in Iran will be able to continue to visit. Her aunt and uncle, both green card holders who have children in the United States, were in the U.S. when the executive order was signed, and now both are uncertain whether it's wise to go back home to Iran — they may not be allowed to return.

"They are here and want to return to Iran, but now they are very worried if they can come back," Golhar said. "They are trying to better understand what is going on and watch the news and ask what they should expect."

What they are feeling, she said, is "panic."

"It's a real mix of emotions," Golhar said. "First, it's disbelief: Is this seriously happening? And then, it's the anger... How could we have allowed this to happen?"

First Lawsuit Filed To Challenge Trump's Refugee Policy

Officers told Iraqi man's attorneys to 'Call Mr. Trump'

By Stephen Dinan

Washington Times, January 28, 2017

Civil liberties groups filed the first lawsuit Saturday morning challenging President Trump's pause on migration from countries troubled by terrorism, saying the halt has already snared two Iraqis who'd already been approved to come to the U.S., and who fear for their lives back home.

The lawsuit says that when lawyers for one of the men demanded to speak to the person responsible for keeping them out, Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officers told them they would have to take it up with new chief: "Call Mr. Trump."

One of the two men refused entry is an interpreter and engineer who was to be admitted under a program rewarding those who helped the U.S. efforts in Iraq, at risk to themselves. The man's family was admitted, but he was detained.

The other man was coming to the U.S. to rejoin his wife and seven-year-old son, who were admitted as refugees three years ago.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Both men were denied entry at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York in the hours after Mr. Trump issued his executive order Friday.

The lawsuit said the Trump order is unconstitutional because it discriminates based on someone's country of birth, and "was substantially motivated by animus" toward Muslims.

"President Trump's war on equality is already taking a terrible human toll. This ban cannot be allowed to continue," said Omar Jadwat, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Immigrants' Rights Project.

Mr. Trump's new policy pauses the refugee program and halts admissions from countries troubled by terrorism, including Syria and Iraq.

The pause is intended to give the new administration a chance to improve screening, Mr. Trump said in the executive order.

The order makes good on his campaign pledge to impose "extreme vetting" of those coming to the U.S.

Human rights groups have called it a "Muslim ban," saying they believe that's what Mr. Trump was really trying to achieve with his policy.

Iraqis Who Spent Years Helping U.S. Among The First Detained Under Trump's Ban

One man, who worked for the U.S. military as an interpreter, has since been released.

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

NEW YORK — Iraqi and Afghan refugees who helped U.S. war efforts were among those detained at airports Friday night after President Donald Trump signed an executive order targeting Muslims and refugees.

Hameed Khalid Darweesh and Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, Iraqis with ties to U.S. operations overseas, were detained late Friday at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport. Darweesh had worked for the U.S. government for 10 years, including as an interpreter. Darweesh's wife and children were let through, but Darweesh was not, Brandon Friedman, a former colleague of Darweesh's, told The Huffington Post.

Darweesh was released Saturday afternoon. In a press conference afterward, he said he'd been held since 6 p.m. Friday in several rooms, and was questioned for many hours.

But despite his ill treatment, Darweesh offered praise for the U.S., calling it "is the greatest country in the world."

Alshawi is a refugee who was rejoining his wife and child in America. His wife, who had worked for a U.S. government contractor, came to the U.S. a few years ago, The Washington Post reported.

Alshawi was released Saturday night, after a federal judge halted parts of Trump's executive order.

Mark Doss, an attorney with the International Refugee Assistance Project who is representing Darweesh and Alshawi, said he and his team were unable to meet with their clients through the night on Friday.

"We've been at JFK all night and none of us have been able to speak with our clients. As far as we know, they are still detained, and we have been unable to actually meet with them in person," Doss told CNN Saturday before Darweesh's release. "To be unlawfully detained here at the airport is really just disgraceful."

"We're fighting very hard to make sure they're not deported to their countries where they can be killed," he added.

Things were also chaotic on the West Coast. An Afghan interpreter was detained at San Francisco International Airport on Friday while his wife and children were allowed through, said Matt Zeller, founder of No One Left Behind, a nonprofit that helps Afghan and Iraqi combat interpreters with special immigrant visas resettle safely in the United States.

Protesters gathered around the country on Saturday in support of the detainees.

U.S. veterans of the Iraq War criticized their government's actions on Saturday as well.

"The idea that we could be detaining Iraqi interpreters who put their lives on the line to help troops like myself in Iraq is disgraceful," Jon Soltz, a veteran and the chairman of VoteVets, said in a statement. "Not only does this not do anything to protect America, but it now sends the message that even if you put your life on the line to help America, if you are Muslim we don't want you here."

The executive order, which Trump signed Friday afternoon, bans Syrian refugee resettlement in the U.S. indefinitely, shuts down the entire refugee program for 120 days, and bars all immigrants and visitors from seven Muslim-majority countries from entering the country for at least 90 days.

U.S. District Judge Ann Donnelly of the Eastern District of New York halted parts of the executive order Saturday after the American Civil Liberties Union, immigrants' rights groups and refugee relief organizations filed a lawsuit against Trump and the U.S. government. A federal judge in Virginia and a district judge in Seattle came to similar decisions later that night.

Broad Lawsuit Challenges Trump Immigration Order

By Josh Gerstein

Politico, January 28, 2017

A California attorney filed a federal lawsuit Saturday broadly challenging President Donald Trump's new executive order limiting immigration from Muslim-majority countries in order to combat terrorism.

The suit, filed Saturday afternoon in U.S. District Court for Northern California, argues that the order intrudes on Congress' legislative authority and violates the Establishment Clause of the Constitution by discriminating on the basis of religion.

"It's a legislative function, so that violates separation of power and it does not meet any of the well-recognized exceptions, so we're asking to enjoin it or repeal it," said Andrew Shalaby, an attorney with East Bay Law in Albany, Calif., near Oakland.

The order Trump signed Friday restricts citizen of seven majority-Muslim countries from traveling to the U.S., implements new procedures for green-card holders from those countries and suspends admission of refugees to the U.S.

The suit does not name any specific plaintiffs, but was filed on behalf of the American public generally and the people of California. Shalaby said he believes the case can be pursued under a California law allowing private individuals to sue on behalf of the public, but it's not clear that will allow the suit to proceed in federal court.

Shalaby said he's confident he can find individual plaintiffs to add to the suit, if a judge rules that is necessary. "I don't think we have a standing problem. If we do, we have a solution to it," he said.

Shalaby said he filed the case because he considered it important to go after the Trump order right away.

"A lot of people in my circles encouraged me to file it," he said. "We wanted to act on it immediately."

A separate class-action federal lawsuit challenging Trump's order was filed early Saturday in New York on behalf of two Iraqi men who had valid visas but were detained on arrival at JFK Airport Friday. One of the men was released Saturday.

The New York case is focused on the impact of the executive order on immigrants who have arrived in the U.S. and are in detention or face possible expulsion in connection with Trump's order. The class action suit, brought in Brooklyn, has the backing of several major immigrant rights organizations, including the International Refugee Assistance Project, the National Immigration Law Center, the American Civil Liberties Union and a legal clinic at Yale Law School. A total of 18 attorneys were listed on legal papers filed in the case, along with seven law-student interns.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations has also announced plans to file another lawsuit Monday against Trump's order.

The cases all face uphill battles in court because most foreigners outside the U.S. have few rights under U.S. law. Cases involving impacts that the Trump order may have on foreign nationals who are U.S. permanent residents (also known as green card holders) could get more traction because they're usually considered to have more legal rights. U.S. citizens may also have success in challenging situations where their foreign spouses or family members appear to be barred from entry into the country.

However, parts of the order seem to be worded to try to undercut legal challenges. For example, part of the order effectively giving priority to Christians in the refugee program refers to cases where "the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country of nationality." In addition, most of the changes in the order are framed as temporary suspensions or reviews—the kinds of measures courts rarely overturn particularly when the executive branch claims national security concerns are at stake.

NYC Airport Becomes Scene Of Anguish After Trump Travel Ban

By William Mathis

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

NEW YORK (AP) – New York City's Kennedy airport became a scene of anguish and desperation Saturday for the families of people detained after arriving in the U.S. from nations subject to President Donald Trump's travel ban.

Many flights to the U.S. already were in the air Friday when the president's order barred entry to citizens of seven predominantly Muslim nations.

Lawyers and advocates working at the airport said they didn't have a hard count on the number of people taken into custody after getting off their flights.

Yosre Ghaled, 25, was among about a dozen distraught people waiting at an airport terminal Saturday to see if loved ones would be released, or put back on an outgoing plane.

Her mother-in-law's sister, a 67-year-old Yemeni citizen coming to live with family in the U.S. because she is sick from heart problems and diabetes, was detained after getting off a plane from Saudi Arabia.

"We're very sad. She lives a very bad life. We try in her last days to (give her) a good life," Ghaled said, adding that the family had been told that she would be refused entry and put on a jet back to Saudi Arabia. "We've waited for this many years, (for) her to come. They should just let us see her. Seeing her would make you feel a little better."

Trump said the goal of the temporary travel restriction was to keep out potential terrorists.

Two members of congress, Democrats Jerrold Nadler and Nydia Velazquez, joined several hundred protesters who spent part of the day at the airport trying to win the release of about a dozen people they said had been detained.

People in the crowd chanted "Let them in." Celebrities including "Sex and the City" actress Cynthia Nixon joined the demonstration.

The detainees in New York included two Iraqis who had previously been given permission to come to the U.S. because of their ties to the U.S. military.

One of them, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, who had worked as an interpreter for the U.S. Army after it invaded Iraq in 2003, emerged from custody to cheers from the crowd in the mid-afternoon.

He pronounced the U.S. "the land of freedom" home to "the greatest people in the world" upon his release, but also expressed dismay about having been initially held.

Still being held at the airport in the late afternoon was Haider Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, 33, an Iraqi who had been trying to reunite with his wife in Texas. She had come to the U.S. because she feared for her life after having worked for a U.S. security contractor.

Lawyers sat on the floor of an airport terminal Saturday evening working up court petitions on their laptops on behalf of detainees.

New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, a Democrat, said he had directed state lawyers and the agency that controls Kennedy to "explore all legal options" to assist anyone detained at New York airports.

"I never thought I'd see the day when refugees, who have fled war-torn countries in search of a better life, would be turned away at our doorstep," Cuomo said. "This is not who we are, and not who we should be."

Striking New York Cabbies Join Airport Protest Against Trump's Muslim Crackdown

Drivers slam the president's "inhumane and unconstitutional ban."

By Mary Papenfuss

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

New York City cab drivers turned mounting chaos at John F. Kennedy International Airport into even more of a snarl with a strike to protest President Donald Trump's crackdown on refugees and support travelers trapped by his executive order.

As hundreds of protesters packed the streets outside JFK's Terminal 4, cabbies stopped whisking people from the airport for an hour on Saturday evening, leaving the taxi line empty and a growing number of frantic travelers scrambling to find alternative transportation.

"We cannot be silent," the New York Taxi Workers Alliance tweeted. "We go to work to welcome people to a land that once welcomed us. We will not be divided."

The action was launched after about a dozen travelers were detained at the airport under Trump's executive order blocking arrivals from seven predominantly Muslim nations. Demonstrators gathered throughout the day to protest the crackdown. The NYTWA called on all cabbies, including Uber drivers, to join them.

A statement from the NYTWA posted on Facebook slammed the "hatred spewed from the bully pulpit." The union vowed: "Our 19,000-member-strong union stands firmly opposed to Donald Trump's Muslim ban. As an organization whose membership is largely Muslim, a workforce that's almost universally immigrant, and a working-class movement that is rooted in the defense of the oppressed, we say no to this inhumane and unconstitutional ban."

Protests against Trump's edict shutting out travelers from Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen were erupting in airports across the nation on Saturday. Hundreds of protesters gathered at San Francisco International Airport, and police shut down access to one of the airport roads, ABC 7 reported.

One Iraqi man detained at JFK on Friday night was later released. Hameed Khalid Darweesh had worked for the U.S. government for 10 years, including as an interpreter.

Cuomo Says State Will Explore Helping Detainees At Airports After Trump's Order

By Bill Mahoney

Politico, January 28, 2017

ALBANY — Gov. Andrew Cuomo announced Saturday night that he has directed several government entities to "explore all legal options" that might be available to help individuals detained at state airports as a result of an executive order issued by President Donald Trump on Friday.

At the same time, one of these entities initially announced that it would effectively limit the ability of individuals to protest the order, before Cuomo said he had asked for that step to be reversed.

Trump's order bans citizens of seven countries with significant Muslim majorities from entering the United States. John F. Kennedy International Airport, which is operated by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, became the flashpoint for protests against the order Saturday after the New York Times described the ordeals of a former Army interpreter who was detained there, and reports emerged of others detained at the airport.

In a release from his campaign committee Saturday, Cuomo, as he's fond of doing, quoted Emma Lazarus.

"I never thought I'd see the day when refugees, who have fled war-torn countries in search of a better life, would be turned away at our doorstep. We are a nation of bridges, not walls, and a great many of us still believe in the words 'give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses,'" he said. "This is not who we are, and not who we should be."

In a separate release from the state on Saturday, the governor added that he's tasked two offices he directly controls and the Port Authority to begin exploring ways to help the detainees.

"I have directed the Port Authority, the Department of State, and my Counsel's Office to jointly explore all legal options to assist anyone detained at New York airports, and ensure that their rights are protected," Cuomo said. "America is a nation of laws and those laws provide rights that must be respected and followed regardless of political ideology."

Attorney General Eric Schneiderman issued a similar statement on Saturday night, saying he "will do everything in [his] power to help those who have been victimized by President Trump's discriminatory and dangerous executive action."

He added that his staff "has been in contact with lawyers for the detained refugees."

Soon after Cuomo made his declaration, the Port Authority announced that in order "to control crowding," it would require tickets to access the AirTrain that numerous individuals have used to arrive at a large protest outside JFK's Terminal 4. This prompted the scorn of some Democrats.

"I am told to prevent NYers joining JFK protest you are requiring airline tix at AirTrain," wrote Manhattan Borough President Gale Brewer in a tweet directed at the Port Authority. "If true, unacceptable. Explain immediately."

Just after 8 p.m., the governor said he had ordered the Port Authority to change course.

"One of the fundamental rights that is granted to the people of this country is the right to peacefully protest," he said in an official statement. "I have ordered the Port Authority to reverse its decision regarding the JFK AirTrain. I have also directed the MTA and the New York State Police to assist with transportation and security needs to ensure the safety of all those participating. The people of New York will have their voices heard."

A number of other New York officials have participated in the protests. U.S. Reps. Nydia Velazquez and Jerry Nadler were at the airport Saturday to announce the release of the detained interpreter, Hameed Jhalid Darweesh.

"This is the soul of America," Darweesh said while embracing Velazquez.

Trump's Executive Order Is Already Hurting Refugees, Muslims And Families

People are being turned away at airports.

By Elise Foley

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump's executive order targeting Muslims and refugees led to chaos in the hours after he signed it, as refugees and immigrants arrived at U.S. airports only to be detained or told they couldn't enter the country and businesses had to scramble to adjust to the new policy.

"We are hearing that last night a lot of people were turned away," said Abed Ayoub, legal director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee. "It's had a direct impact on a lot of people."

The order, which Trump signed Friday afternoon, bans Syrian refugee resettlement in the U.S. indefinitely. It will also shut down the entire refugee program for 120 days and bar all immigrants and visitors from seven Muslim-majority countries — Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen — from entering the U.S. for at least 90 days.

The order goes far beyond refugees or tourists — it means that about 500,000 green card holders who reside in the U.S. but are originally from one of the seven countries will need a waiver to return to their homes, White House officials said Saturday. It also applies to people from the seven countries who hold dual citizenship and are not U.S. citizens. This means that people of both French and Yemeni nationality, for example, would be denied entry.

Coming in the late hours of Friday, and with little apparent consultation with other agencies and groups prior to its publication, the president's order has created havoc and confusion among those tasked with overseeing entry into the country, to say nothing of the people actually trying to enter the U.S.

On Saturday afternoon, nearly 24 hours after Trump signed the order, a White House official said the administration was still working to determine the exact meaning of a very important piece of language: "in transit." The order says that authorities may "determine to admit individuals to the United States as refugees on a case-by-case basis" in instances "when the person is already in transit and denying admission would cause undue hardship."

Because the precise meaning of that language is not clear, however, many people who were in transit when the order was signed have been detained and in some cases barred from entering the country.

In the hours after Trump signed the order, government authorities detained two Iraqis at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport, The New York Times reported. One of the men, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, worked for the U.S. government for 10 years as an interpreter. He was detained upon landing at JFK on Friday night, but his wife and children were let through, a former colleague of Darweesh's told The Huffington Post. Darweesh was released the following day.

The other detained man, Sameer Abdulkhaleq Alshawi, was coming to the country to join his child and wife, who had worked for a U.S. government contractor, The Washington Post reported.

Lawyers for the two men told CNN they have filed a lawsuit against the president and the government over their detention. The action in federal court seeks a writ of habeas corpus — an order declaring their detention illegal — and the certification of a class action covering any immigrants and refugees denied admission at ports of entry across the country, according to the complaint filed in New York.

Google, meanwhile, told traveling staff members to come back to the U.S., BBC News reported.

And refugee organizations began notifying volunteers that the families they planned to help were no longer on their way. Alisa Wartick, 36, said she and a group of 38 people in her neighborhood had co-sponsored a Syrian refugee family through the organization Refugee One in Chicago.

The family — a mother, father and 16-month-old daughter — was supposed to arrive on Monday to join the woman's parents and siblings. The co-sponsorship group had already furnished their apartment, and met the family via FaceTIme so they could see their new home, which they now may never see again.

"Just imagining raising a child in a refugee camp environment and then being told you could see your family again, you could be reunited with your mom and your daughter's grandma and being told 'No, sorry, you're three days too late for that' — I can't imagine what that's like," Wartick said.

Church World Service, one of the organizations that handles refugee resettlement, had been planning to welcome 212 refugees next week, 164 of them joining family members already in the United States, according to a spokeswoman. Those 212 refugees are no longer expected to arrive.

Protesters gathered at airports throughout the country on Saturday to demonstrate against Trump's executive order. Hundreds crowded JFK's Terminal 4, chanting "Love trumps hate!" and "No hate, no fear, refugees are welcome here!" BuzzFeed broadcast the protest live on Facebook.

Large crowds were also reported at San Francisco International Airport, Chicago O'Hare International Airport and Washington Dulles International Airport.

Though Trump, on the campaign trail, had pledged to stop refugees from certain Muslim-majority countries from entering the United States, there was some skepticism that he would actually follow through on the proposal. Business groups had warned against it, as did religious organizations, including some with traditionally conservative political leanings.

Moreover, congressional Republicans spoke out over the summer against any policy that would bar people from entering the United States based on their religion. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) was one of those critics. But on Friday evening, he offered a statement of support for Trump's proposal.

The ripple effects of the executive order make clear the difficulty in taking a blunt campaign promise and applying it to real-world governance, with seemingly unforeseen outcomes and immediate, frightening disruption in people's lives. People took to Twitter to share the uncertainty now surrounding their Syrian colleagues and friends.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

In other cases, people who made it to safety in the United States are now having trouble meeting family members from their home countries. Mohammed Al Rawi, who risked his life working for the Los Angeles Times bureau in Baghdad, moved to Long Beach, California, in 2010. His 69-year-old father was leaving Qatar to fly to Los Angeles to visit him Friday night when a U.S. official stopped him and informed him that Trump had "canceled all visas," Al Rawi wrote on Facebook.

U.S. officials then detained Al Rawi's father in an unknown location and confiscated his passport, making it impossible for Al Rawi to book him a hotel in Qatar to sleep for the night, he said. His father's phone died, so he has not been able to get in touch.

Meathaq, 45, and Mahmoud, 49, of Baghdad just arrived in Knoxville, Tennessee, in August with their 5-year-old son and 15-year-old daughter. But they have twin 18-year-old daughters still living in Iraq.

Thanks to Mahmoud's work as a translator for the U.S. Army, they were able to get a special immigrant visa. The process for approving their visas took four years, beginning when they first applied in 2012. By that time their daughters were over 18, which meant the U.S. government required greater processing. Now the twins are stuck in Baghdad, and their parents fear they will not be able to reunite with them. (Both Meathaq and Mahmoud withheld their last names out of concern for their twin daughters' safety.)

"I am crying all the time, especially after the new law from President Trump," Meathaq said. "I miss them and the situation in Iraq is so bad and I don't know what to do to help."

Even the film industry has felt the impact. The executive order will prevent Iranian film director Asghar Farhadi from traveling to the Oscars ceremony next month. Farhadi's "The Salesman" was nominated in the Best Foreign Language Film category this year. Farhadi became the first Iranian director to win an Oscar in that category in 2012. Iranian actress Taraneh Alidoosti, a co-lead in "The Salesman," said this week that she would boycott the Oscars over the visa ban.

Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, shared several stories on Twitter of individuals affected by the ban, including people with green cards to be in the U.S. The Huffington Post is working to verify those stories.

Zane Shami, a naturalized U.S. citizen who has lived in the U.S. for over two decades, said he'd been expecting his mother, who is 67, to arrive to live with him on Feb. 7.

Shami's mother was born in Syria but has been living in Kuwait, where Shami was born and where his siblings live, since the civil war in her native country leveled her town. She was approved to come to the U.S. as a refugee after extensive vetting, Shami said. But now she's unable to move here as planned, or even to visit.

"I've done everything right. I did the checklist," Shami said. "There's no reason my mom can't come here. It's very un-American to say that we're going to ban her just because she has a Syrian passport. That doesn't sound American to me."

NBC Philadelphia reported that two Syrian families were blocked from entering the United States in Philadelphia and were sent back on a flight home.

Ayoub said that given confusion over whether the executive order applies to people who hold green cards, and that some have been detained for hours before being released.

Nashwan Abdullah, 25, of Damascus, Syria, is on track to finish his master's degree in music performance at Indiana University of Pennsylvania in May. Now that Trump has banned immigration from Syria, Abdullah's not sure if he'll be able to stay. He had been hoping to apply for a 12-month work visa available to foreign students, but does not know if this is possible any longer.

Abdullah is sure, however, that he will not return to Syria. He does not want to be drafted into the Syrian military, or deal with the danger and scarcities of basic necessities in the Syrian capital.

"Of course I am afraid to go back. It's a war zone. It's an unsafe, bad situation," he said.

There is one glimmer of hope for Abdullah: He is Catholic, so he is not sure if the ban is "going to include me or not."

This story will be updated as more information becomes available.

Protests Erupt Against Ban On Refugees

By Hannan Adely

USA Today, January 28, 2017

Protests erupted at area airports Saturday as Americans reacted in outrage to President Trump's sweeping order that banned people from seven Muslim-majority countries from entering the U.S. and suspended the nation's refugee program – an order than many assailed as un-American and discriminatory.

More than 120 people gathered at Newark Liberty International Airport clutching signs denouncing the executive order, alongside lawyers who rushed to airports to defend the rights of refugees, immigrants and green-card holders, among others, who were being detained and denied entry.

"This banning of people based on religion is not constitutional and it's not what we are about," said Yamandou Alexander of Jersey City, who hurried to Newark airport when he found out about the demonstration. Alexander, a U.S. citizen who was born in France and who is Muslim, said he couldn't stay away.

At the airport, attorneys stood by to help those in need. Attorney David A. Isaacson, who practices primarily immigration law in New York, said he learned of a Syrian citizen with a green card who arrived from Germany at around 4 p.m. was still begin questioned two hours later, as his daughter waited for him to be released.

A Rutgers Ph.d student who went to visit her ill mother in Syria and was on her way back also was having problems getting back into the country, said Attorney Ayanna Lewis-Gruss. She said the students host family reached out to attorneys at the airport after the woman was stopped on a layover in Paris and was not allowed to fly to Newark.

The protests on Saturday were organized spontaneously and grew throughout the day as news spread about the far-reaching impact of Trump's order. There were reports about legal residents detained at borders, stranded in other countries and in some cases deported. At the same time, refugees who had gone through years-long approvals to come to the U.S. were also being barred. As word spread, protests were organized too in other cities including Chicago and Dallas.

At John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, more than 1,000 people gathered by Saturday evening as word spread of the protest.

"I was in disbelief. I just had to jump in my car and head out here," said Hillary Frileck, of Brooklyn.

"This is what really scares me. This resonates with me. One person (who was detained) works for us. These people have visas. It's important for us to speak up. We have to rise up. We can't just lay on our couches and think things will be okay."

Emily Witt, of Brooklyn, said she viewed that the ban was a "bad moral decision" especially given that it was Holocaust Remembrance Day.

"Like everyone else, I'm just shocked and afraid," she said. "I didn't think I would see this. It's a rebuke to us. Once you start registering people because of their beliefs, it's the first step toward a country that goes against American values, where our right to free speech and freedom of religion and freedom of expression is threatened."

Sara Cullinane, director of Make The Road New Jersey, which organized the demonstration in the Newark, said they chose the airport because it's one of the hubs for refugee arrivals who are then relocated to different parts of the country. "We are all learning about the order means and how it will be interpreted," she said.

U.S. Immigrants React To Ban: 'Our President Is Trying To Divide Us'

By Usa Today Network

USA Today, January 28, 2017

The nation's immigrants watched in trepidation Saturday as President Trump's immigration ban went into effect with abrupt results.

The executive order temporarily banning all refugees — as well as more specific restrictions on predominantly Muslim countries — drew lawsuits, protests and outrage on social media as travelers were stopped from boarding U.S-bound planes and detained at international airports.

Across the country, some immigrants already in the United States were enveloped in feelings of fear and uncertainty.

Ibado Mahmud came to the United States as a refugee in 1993 after fleeing the civil war in her native Somalia and spending more than two years living in a refugee camp in neighboring Kenya.

Today, she is one of 7,193 Somali refugees resettled in Arizona since 1992. It's a far cry from her old life. She recalls fleeing Somalia for her life with her husband and two young daughters in December 1990 and then driving in a car to Kenya with a caravan of nearly 50 other refugees. She saw people die and be raped.

"You heard the lions roaring every night," she said. "I used to wrap me and my two girls in long clothes so if the lion came, he would have to eat all three of us."

Since coming to the U.S., Mahmud has rebuilt her life in Arizona and raised seven children. She owns her own house and for the past 17 years has worked at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport, alongside refugees from Iraq, Eritrea, Libya, Sudan, Ethiopia and many other countries.

But Mahmud worries other refugees will not get the same chance because of Trump's decision Friday to temporarily freeze the arrival of all refugees and indefinitely halt the arrival of refugees from Syria.

"A lot of people are grateful to be here, to be part of this country. We appreciate what the United States did for us," the 56-year-old said. "We are hoping they will do many other great things to people who are hurting, that people who are dying for no reason, to people who don't have a life."

Mahmud said she has felt welcome in the U.S. but worries Trump's executive orders could lead to discrimination against Muslims like her.

"What I am scared of is that he is going to divide us," she said.

At the Masjid Bilal Islamic Center in West Louisville on Friday afternoon, dozens of refugees from Somalia, Syria and

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Iraq gathered for prayers. They said many were now cut off from ailing or impoverished family members who were trying to join them in the U.S., and some worried about what some called an atmosphere of "Islamophobia." Advocates were organizing rallies of support.

"It is devastating," said Abanur Saidi, chairman of the mosque who also works with refugees for Catholic Charities and who is among thousands of Somalis in the Louisville region. "These are people that don't have anything to do with terrorism. They are victims of terror, that's why they are leaving their country."

Others said they worried the new Trump directive would be counter-productive.

"This policy seems to be directed at the Muslims — and I'm really concerned that this decision will strengthen terrorists and extremist groups, they will have more material to brainwash people that America is against Islam," said Mohammad Babar, a Muslim leader in Louisville.

Those at the Bilal mosque Friday were signing a petition organized by a coalition of refugee groups seeking to get 10,000 signatures before a planned rally next month. Leaders are urging supporters to write letters to legislators. Meantime, the Louisville Muslim Community and a coalition of groups said they would host an event Saturday to highlight the importance of dialogue and consider grassroots actions in the face of what they called "increasing Islamaphobia" and other issues.

"Our president is trying to divide us," said Farhan Abdi, executive director of Muslim Americans for Compassion. He said refugees and immigrants are "doctors, teachers, lawyers, business owners, factory workers" who will "keep fighting to keep America welcoming."

Charlotte Gosso came to Rochester in December from Côte d'Ivoire via a refugee camp in Ghana; she was the first Ivoirian refugee here. Her prayers go to her country and her relatives there, the only ones she has.

There are only a handful of Ivoirians in Rochester, and it seems unlikely any more will be arriving.

Gosso thinks of a woman she knew in the refugee camp in Ghana. It would take Gosso up to three days to travel to Accra, the capital, for bureaucratic matters, and there was no one to watch her son while she was gone. The woman would help her, and give her some rice when she needed it to feed her sons.

The woman and her husband would like to come to the United States, and Gosso would welcome them. She speaks only French and is confined to her small apartment unless someone can help her with Guy.

Lisa Hoyt, director of the Catholic Family Center's Refugee, Immigration & Language Services Department, described another case. A mother and seven children were supposed to arrive in Rochester on Tuesday. The family is Somali but is living in a refugee camp in Kenya.

The oldest of the children is 19. The youngest is 2. Their new life here is waiting. But someone in the group got sick, postponing their travel.

"Think about what's happened," she said. "These people literally could have missed this opportunity ... through no fault of their own."

Caught in the middle of the Syrian civil war, Abdul and Manal fled the bombs and the fighting in the city of Homs. In December 2015, after years in a refugee camp, the door opened for them to come to America and, more specifically, Indianapolis.

The young couple joined a tiny colony of Syrian refugees who've been relocated here by groups such as Catholic Charities, as in their case, and Exodus Refugee Immigration. In a little more than two years, Exodus has resettled 225 Syrians to Indianapolis. Catholic Charities has resettled 77 Syrians.

More than a year after their arrival, Abdul (whose full name is Abdul Sater Khaled Assaf) and Manal (al Khadour) are making a decent life for themselves and their two young daughters. But the immigration controversy leaves them fearful that the loved ones they left behind — namely Abdul's parents and his brother — could be denied a similar rescue.

"I'm concerned a lot that they might not get to come," Manal said in Arabic, through his Catholic Charities translator, Sajjad Jawad, himself once a refugee from Iraq.

Abdul and Manal say they like Indiana — even the weather, which they say is similar to Homs. But the joy of their new life is tempered by their awareness of the death and destruction they left behind in Syria. They worry about their family in refugee camps in Jordan, Lebanon and Turkey, where they say life is hard. They doubt they'll ever see their homeland again.

Abdul has been picking up what he can about American politics. Asked if he could tell President Trump something about the Syrian refugee situation, he said: "I would tell him 'Bring the refugees. Let them come. Because I lived with them. And I know the conditions.' "

Hundreds Rally In Boston Against Trump's Immigrant Policies

By Nicole Fleming And Martha Schick

Boston Globe, January 28, 2017

A crowd of more than 300 gathered in Chinatown Saturday afternoon to protest President Trump's controversial executive order that bars immigrants from some predominantly Muslim countries and refugees from entering the country.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Marching toward the State House, the protesters held signs reading, "Immigrants make America great" and "No trade war," as they chanted, "Donald Trump, you racist clown! Build a wall, we'll tear it down!"

Trump, elected in November, made immigration a top issue in his presidential campaign, vowing to build a wall along the country's southern border with Mexico and deport many undocumented immigrants. In the days since he took office, Trump has signed several executive orders that could have long-reaching effects on the country's immigration system.

Under a Friday order, Trump suspended entry to the country for all refugees for 120 days and banned Syrian refugees indefinitely. Immigration from seven predominantly Muslim countries — Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen — has also been suspended for 90 days.

The order has created chaos for people who were in transit to the United States. Boston-area academics, including members of the MIT and Harvard communities, are among those affected by Trump's order.

Ron Newman of Somerville, who attended the rally, said the order reminded him of how the MS St. Louis, a ship carrying more than 900 Jewish refugees from Germany, was turned away by countries including the United States in 1939. Many of the refugees later died in concentration camps.

"It seems like Donald Trump wants to repeat that history," said Newman, who is Jewish. "I think anyone who fought in World War II, whose family fought in World War II, should consider this [executive order] to be a betrayal of what they fought for."

"Immigrants are giving more than they are taking," said Martha Rodriguez, a Venezuelan immigrant who attended the rally with her two young sons. Rodriguez said she became a citizen last year but has relatives who are undocumented.

Many undocumented immigrants do pay taxes, Rodriguez said, and they can't benefit from government assistance because of restrictions already in place.

"The three of us are here for those who are too afraid to speak for themselves," she said.

The rally was organized by Boston May Day. The immigrants' rights group is affiliated with Cosecha, a group that is organizing a "Migrant Boycott" with immigrants pledging to abstain from shopping, as well as attending work and school, to show the influence of immigrants on the economy.

Gerardo Molinari of Somerville, who attended the protest as a member of a local chapter of the International Socialist Organization, said he moved to the United States from Central America in 2009.

"I'm not here because I want to be," Molinari said. "I work 40 hours a week. I'd love to be in my house resting, but I feel like I need to be here in solidarity with those standing up to Trump's hate speech."

In front of the State House, the group listened to speakers, several of whom criticized President Obama's immigration policy along with Trump's. The Obama administration deported more than 2.5 million undocumented immigrants — the most of any administration in history.

"Obama voted for the wall; Hillary Clinton voted for the wall," Lyn Meza said. "Donald Trump is just increasing a wall that is already there, that has been voted for by Democrats."

"We continue to be the working class," said Sergio Reyes, with Boston May Day. "Let us not have the Democrats hijack our people's movement."

Cairo Mendes stressed the importance of intersectionality as he addressed the crowd, saying that he would stand with Muslims and LGBT people, calling them his "family."

Mendes, an organizer for the Student Immigration Movement, said he and his family are undocumented immigrants. His mother works as a housekeeper and must drive to work every day without a license, he said.

"Being an undocumented immigrant is a walking embodiment of resistance," he said.

As Amy Cardoso of Woburn reached the State House with the other protesters, she said she was happily surprised by the turnout. Her husband Rivelino immigrated from Brazil, she said, so she knows the country's broken immigration system firsthand.

"If I changed one person's mind on the way here, that's success to me," Cardoso said.

The Massachusetts chapter of the Council on American Islamic Relations has organized another protest against Trump's executive order, scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday at Copley Square, followed by a 2:30 p.m. Muslim prayer.

By 5 p.m. Saturday, more than 5,000 people had RSVP'd to the Facebook event, with another 15,000 indicating interest.

Hundreds of people participated in the protest a day after President Trump issued his order.

Baker, Local Pols Oppose Trump Immigration Order

By Jim O'Sullivan

Boston Globe, January 28, 2017

Republican Governor Charlie Baker opposes the immigrant ban President Trump has imposed on migrants and refugees from seven Middle Eastern and North African nations, Baker aides said Saturday.

"Governor Baker opposes applying religious tests to the refugee system and believes that focusing on countries' predominant religions will not make the US any safer, as terrorists have demonstrated a determination to strike from all corners of the world," spokesman Brendan Moss wrote in an e-mail.

"Instead, Governor Baker believes the federal government should focus on improving the techniques and systems in place to stop dangerous people from entering the country, regardless of the nation they seek to strike from," he added.

Nationally, Republicans have been largely quiet since Trump signed the executive order on Friday. But Baker is one of many elected officials in Massachusetts who stated their opposition to Trump's order, including Mayor Martin J. Walsh, US Representative Seth Moulton, and US senators Edward J. Markey and Elizabeth Warren.

The ban, which explicitly forbids refugees from war-ravaged Syria from entering the United States, has also reportedly affected longtime residents, many of whom are green card holders effectively blocked from returning to the country.

"There are people around the world who have nothing to do with ISIS, and he's trying to make them all the same," Walsh said in a telephone interview Saturday evening.

Walsh, who held a defiant and emotional press conference last week during which he promised to use City Hall to house undocumented immigrants sought by federal immigration officials, charged Trump with ignorance of the nuances of geopolitics and terrorism.

The first-term Dorchester Democrat said he has had several conversations in recent days with other Democratic big-city mayors about a host of issues — including immigration, health care, and climate change — and they shared concern over Trump's actions.

"What he's doing potentially could have drastic, lasting impacts on the American economy, and by extension the Massachusetts economy," Walsh said.

Moulton, a Salem Democrat and decorated Marine veteran of the Iraq War, said the ban extends to foreign nationals who have aided US forces in war zones. He said "a lot more Marines that I served with would have died" without assistance from Iraqi translators and intelligence sources.

"They kept us from being killed and they helped us find our enemies," Moulton said during a phone interview Saturday afternoon. "These are people who have put their lives on the line for not just their countries but ours. The least we owe them is a chance to keep on living."

"Frankly, it's a pretty dangerous situation," said Moulton, an outspoken Trump critic who likened the president's campaign to Adolf Hitler's rise. "What Americans need to realize is that this absolutely puts out national security and our troops on the front line in danger."

Moulton said one of his own Iraqi translators, from Najaf, just moved to the United States "a month or two ago. Thank God he got here before Trump got into office."

Moulton, who served under General James Mattis when the latter commanded the First Marine Division in Iraq, backed his nomination to become Trump's defense secretary. But the congressman said he was "shocked" that Mattis stood alongside Trump as the president signed the executive order on Friday.

Moulton said he was confident that Mattis privately opposes the measure. "But General Mattis knows better" than to lend his tacit approval by appearing at the signing, he said.

Warren urged Trump via Twitter to rescind the executive order and stand behind refugees from the affected countries.

She also noted that Friday was Holocaust Remembrance Day, a reminder of what can happen when people remain silent.

"Turning our back on refugees because of their religion creates recruiting fodder for ISIS and other terrorist groups," Warren wrote.

Markey said on Twitter Saturday afternoon that he will fight Trump's "immoral Muslim ban" that could affect the Bay State.

Massachusetts "thrives from the diversity of our immigrant community — in universities, business, and workforce," he wrote. "Isolation harms our economy and families."

Baker's opposition to the order is far from his first break with Trump. In December 2015, after Trump proposed banning Muslims from entering the country, Baker swiped at him.

"I think that's ridiculous, and I would never support a policy like that," he told reporters at the time. "I have no idea what the motivation is on that. First of all, it's unrealistic. Secondly, it's inappropriate. And third, it doesn't make any sense."

Congresswoman, Lawyers Working To Free 13 Detainees At O'Hare

By Sam Charles, Lynn Sweet And Matthew Hendrickson

Chicago Sun-Times, January 28, 2017

At least 13 people remained under detention at O'Hare International Airport Saturday evening, a day after President Donald Trump signed an executive order barring refugees and green card holders from seven Muslim-majority nations from entering the country.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Dozens of attorneys crowded the international terminal for most of the afternoon Saturday, offering pro bono legal aid to anyone who said their family members had been held by authorities.

U.S. Rep. Jan Schakowsky said she was working to secure the release of the rest.

Just before 6 p.m., the first person to tell attorneys his family was detained, Mohammad Amirisefat, was reunited with his sister, brother-in-law and their 6-month-old son, who were returning from visiting family in Iran.

After more than five hours of detention, Hessameddin Noorian and his wife Zahra Amirisefat, along with their baby son Ryan, passed through the gates of O'Hare's International Terminal.

Noorian said he was interviewed a half hour.

"They asked us to sit there, no cell phone, no call, no nothing," he said. "It was like 20 hours flight, and (we) were there for almost six hours, and I'm so tired."

Noorian said he didn't know the executive order applied to those like him who hold green cards.

"I thought as long as you have a green card, then you're safe, you're fine," Noorian said.

Asked how it felt to be detained in a country where he lives, works and had a child, Noorian said: "The only thing I could say is [it] seems something changed."

Julia Schlozman, one of the attorneys who traveled to O'Hare, helped resolve the Mohammad family's detention.

"I heard that there was a gentlemen being detained who had dual Iranian/British citizenship, and I had the idea, 'Maybe the British government has something to say about the fact that a U.K. passport is not being recognized by U.S. immigration authorities,'" Schlozman said.

Schlozman called "an emergency line" in London to see if the British authorities could follow up, and they said they would.

"I have no idea whether that had anything to do with any movement on the case, but I guess it was something," she said.

Rep. Schakowsky said after making "non stop" phone calls, she finally reached someone at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, which helped free the family who had arrived early Saturday afternoon on a flight from Frankfurt, Germany.

"It's unbelievable," she said.

As of 6 p.m., attorneys estimated there were still at least 13 people being detained. Earlier in the evening, immigration attorney Fiona McEntee said the U.S. Customs and Border Patrol would not let her see her client or honor the G-28 agreement that gave her the right to make decisions on her client's behalf.

About 150 protesters came to the international terminal to decry the executive order, eventually holding a rally outside Gate 5B.

Saturday night, attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union and other groups were in federal court in New York, arguing that Trump's executive order was unconstitutional.

Earlier Saturday, Mohammad Amerisifat worried about when his relatives, who teach at Oakton Community College and live in Park Ridge, would be released.

"The officer told me, 'go out and wait patiently,'" he said, adding that family members of both his sister and brother-in-law were constantly text messaging him for new information, though he had none to give them.

As Amerisifat was addressing reporters, another man walked up and asked attorneys for help because, he said, his wife and child had been detained as well.

The fallout grew Saturday from Trump's immigration crackdown as U.S. legal permanent residents and visa-holders from seven Muslim-majority countries who had left the United States found they could not return for 90 days.

It was a period of limbo for an unknown number of non-American citizens from Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia or Yemen now barred from the country where they were studying or had lived, perhaps for years.

A federal law enforcement official who confirmed the temporary ban said there was an exemption for foreigners whose entry is in the U.S. national interest. It was not immediately clear how that exemption might be applied. Trump's order exempts diplomats.

Those already in the U.S. with a visa or green card will be allowed to stay, according to the official, who wasn't authorized to publicly discuss the details of how Trump's order was being put in place and spoke only on condition of anonymity. Immigrant rights groups and lawyers were advising those in the U.S. with a visa or a green card to not leave the country.

Customs and Border Protection was notifying airlines about passengers whose visas had been canceled, and legal residents scheduled to fly back to the U.S. Airlines were being told to keep them off those flights.

Representatives from the Chicago Department of Aviation and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement deferred questions to U.S. Customs and Border Protection. Messages left with several agency representatives were not acknowledged Saturday.

Trump's order barred all refugees from entering the U.S. for four months and indefinitely halted any from Syria. He said the ban was needed to keep out "radical Islamic terrorists."

The next group of refugees was due to arrive in the U.S. on Monday, but the official said they would not be allowed into the country.

The president's order immediately suspended a program that last year resettled in the U.S. roughly 85,000 people displaced by war, political oppression, hunger and religious prejudice. The order singled out Syrians for the most aggressive ban, ordering that anyone from that country, including those fleeing civil war, are indefinitely blocked from coming to the U.S.

"We want to ensure that we are not admitting into our country the very threats our soldiers are fighting overseas," Trump said as he signed the order at the Pentagon. "We only want to admit those into our country who will support our country and love deeply our people."

Trump's ban on asylum-seekers came down even as Iraqis endangered by work for the United States in their home country were mid flight to their hoped-for refuge in the United States. As a result, they and countless other refugees, their families and aid workers scrambled Saturday as Muslim travelers were turned back on arrival at U.S. airports or blocked from boarding flights to America.

Organizations including the International Refugees Assistance Project, which helps former Iraqi translators for the U.S. military and other refugees seeking entry to the United States, and other organizations aiding asylum-seekers, rushed translators and lawyers to airports to try to help U.S.-approved asylum-seekers already on their way to the country as Trump's ban came down.

Earlier Saturday, several groups, including the International Refugees Assistance Project, the National Immigration Law Center and the American Civil Liberties Union, filed a lawsuit in federal court in New York after two Iraqi men were detained at Kennedy International Airport and threatened with deportation even though they have valid visas to enter the United States, the complaint alleged.

One of the men was released after hours of detention, the New York Times reported Saturday afternoon.

"The situation is chaotic," said Ahmed Rehab, a spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "People have been turned away. People have been put in handcuffs."

Rehab added that CAIR was building a database of those detained as of Saturday morning and working to connect them with lawyers.

Added Lena F. Masri, the group's national litigation director: "There is no evidence that refugees — the most thoroughly vetted of all people entering our nation — are a threat to national security. This is an order that is based on bigotry, not reality."

But Trump said the halt in the refugee program was necessary to give agencies time to develop a stricter screening system. While the order did not spell out what additional steps he wants the departments of Homeland Security and State to take, the president directed officials to review the refugee application and approval process and find any more measures that could prevent those who pose a threat from using the refugee program.

The U.S. may admit refugees on a case-by-case basis during the freeze, and the government will continue to process requests from people claiming religious persecution, "provided that the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country."

In an interview with CBN News, Trump said persecuted Christians would be given priority in applying for refugee status.

"We are going to help them," Trump said. "They've been horribly treated."

As a candidate, Trump called for a temporary ban on all Muslim immigration to the U.S. He later shifted his focus to putting in place "extreme vetting" procedures to screen people coming to the U.S. from countries with terrorism ties.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations said it would challenge the constitutionality of the executive order.

During the past budget year, the U.S. accepted 84,995 refugees, including 12,587 people from Syria. President Barack Obama had set the refugee limit for this budget year at 110,000.

According to Trump's executive order, he plans to cut that to 50,000. Refugee processing was suspended in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks and restarted months later.

The president's action was applauded by House Speaker Paul Ryan, who said it was "time to re-evaluate and strengthen the visa-vetting process."

But many Democrats cast the measures as un-American.

"Tears are running down the cheeks of the Statue of Liberty tonight as a grand tradition of America, welcoming immigrants, that has existed since America was founded has been stomped upon," Senate Democratic leader Chuck Schumer of New York said Friday.

Trump's order was signed on Holocaust Remembrance Day, which brought to mind the global effort to help refugees during World War II and its aftermath.

The order makes no mention of a plan to provide safe zones in Syria and the surrounding area. A draft of the order had directed the Pentagon and the State Department to produce a plan for safe zones in the war-torn Mideast nation.

18 People Held At O'Hare After Trump Order, Including Park Ridge Man: Lawyers

By Grace Wong and Stacy St. Clair

Chicago Tribune, January 28, 2017

The family of a Park Ridge man said Saturday he was detained at O'Hare International Airport after returning with his family from Iran, one of the countries affected by President Donald Trump's executive order on immigration.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

In addition to the Park Ridge man, a resident of Oak Lawn also was possibly being detained, according to his son.

They were believed to be among as many as 18 people held at O'Hare because of the order, according to lawyers working with the International Refugee Assistance Project.

"This is insulting. This is insane, this is truly insane," said Mohammad Amirisefat, brother-in-law of the Park Ridge man.

The man returning from Iran, Hessam Noorian, was detained after landing at O'Hare shortly after noon, Amirisfat said. He said his sister and the couple's 6-month-old child were initially held too but were let go.

Noorian has a dual citizenship with Iran and the United Kingdom and has been living in Park Ridge with a green card, Amirisefat said.

Both he and Amirisefat's sister, Zehra Amirisefat, are professors at Oakton Community College. Zehra Amirisefat is a U.S. citizen, he said.

The couple left about a month ago to visit Tehran and introduce their baby to their family.

"The previous government granted a person a green card and the next government is just like, 'We don't care,'" Amirisefat said.

Trump's executive order, signed late Friday afternoon, suspends entry of all refugees to the United States for 120 days, bars Syrian refugees indefinitely and blocks entry for 90 days for citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen.

The Department of Homeland Security said the order also bars green card holders from those countries from re-entering the United States. White House officials said Saturday that green card holders from the seven affected countries would need a case-by-case waiver to return to the United States.

As Amirisefat spoke, about 25 lawyers summoned by the International Refugee Assistance Project gathered near McDonald's at O'Hare. They paced through the arrivals terminal, making their presence known to people who were waiting for travelers.

Hannah Garst, a Chicago lawyer, said as many as 18 people have been held in "secondary detention" at O'Hare because of the order.

She claimed they were being illegally held because they have not been granted lawyers and are being held in a room. Garst said many of them are not being allowed cellphones.

Elissa Mittman, executive vice president for operations of the International Refugee Assistance Project, said the executive order prompted the group to mobilize attorneys from around the country because refugees are being detained and sent back to their countries and Trump has shut down the refugee program for 120 days.

"Shutting down the refugee admission program is misguided in terms of national security and international interests," Mittman said.

About eight protesters were are also on hand at O'Hare, holding signs. A rally was planned for 6 p.m.

An Oak Lawn man, Nasser Mused, 36, said he believed his father was being held at O'Hare because of Trump's order. He said he started to think something was wrong when his father didn't contact him two hours after his plane landed.

Abdulsalam Mused, 67, left Chicago in December to attend his son's wedding in Saudi Arabia. He is a Yemen passport holder with an American green card, his son said.

Nearly five hours after his father's plane landed, Nasser Mused said he had received no texts or calls on what was taking so long.

Abdulsalam Mused is a green card holder and was looking forward to seeking citizenship this May, Nasser Mused said.

"He did everything right," Nasser Mused said of his father. "He feels safe here because you have freedom of speech and freedom to be who you want to be. This is our country. He would do anything to serve this country."

Nasser said he feels concerned that people are being divided into groups and that he has never felt singled out like this before. He didn't expect his father to be held.

"It's indescribable," he said, wiping the side of his face with his hand while closing his eyes. "I've never felt that before. Never in my life."

Nour Ulayyet, 40, of Valparaiso, Ind., told the Associated Press that her sister, a Syrian living in Saudi Arabia, was sent back after arriving at O'Hare from Riyadh and told she couldn't enter the U.S. to help care for their sick mother. Ulayyet said some officials at the airport were apologizing to her sister, who had a valid visa.

"My mom was already having pain enough to go through this on top of the pain that she's having," Ulayyet said.

Immigration Attorneys At LAX Helping Immigrants, Many From Iran, Detained By Federal Officials

By Matt Pearce And Dakota Smith, Contact Reporters
Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2017

At least 10 to 15 immigration attorneys have gathered at the Tom Bradley International Terminal at LAX international terminal to help travelers, mostly from Iran, who have been detained, one of the attorneys said Saturday.

Attorneys have not yet been able to determine the number of fliers detained, as customs officials are not allowing attorneys or their families any access or communication with the detainees, said immigration attorney Jordan Cunnings.

"We're literally walking around, asking people, are you waiting for someone who has been detained?" said Cunnings, describing a scene of worried family members who had arrived bearing flowers and welcome signs for their loved ones.

Some of the detained travelers included green-card holders, tourists, people with children and people with medical problems, Cunnings said.

One detained traveler was an Iranian woman who'd held a green card in the U.S. for five years and whose citizenship swearing-in ceremony is in two weeks, Cunnings said.

The woman has an 11-month old child with her who is an American citizen.

"People don't have phone access or communication access to the people waiting for them, or their attorneys," Cunnings said. "It''s just really heartbreaking."

A candlelight vigil to support Muslim refugees is scheduled for Saturday afternoon at Los Angeles International Airport. Meanwhile, another protest was underway in downtown Los Angeles.

The vigil comes in response to President Trump's executive order suspending refugee arrivals and banning travel to the United States from seven Muslim-majority countries.

The abrupt ban ensnared people from all walks of life who were caught in transit or expecting to soon return to the U.S. — students on a break from studies, business travelers, tourists, even the bereaved who had gone home for a funeral.

The LAX candlelight vigil is being organized by the Service Employees International Union, and several politicians are expected to attend, including Assembly Speaker Anthony Rendon. The protest is planned for 5 p.m.

A group of advocacy organizations, including the American Civil Liberties Union, filed a legal action against the policy on Saturday in New York, acting on behalf of two Iraqis who were stopped at John F. Kennedy International Airport hours after the order was signed. The writ seeks the release of the two Iraqis, who hold valid U.S. visas, unless the government can show lawful grounds for their detention.

The groups bringing the action, which also included the International Refugee Assistance Project and the National Immigration Law Center, said a separate motion sets the stage for a larger action involving other would-be refugees, visitors and immigrants stopped at other ports of entry.

Trump's Immigration Ban Draws Deep Anger And Muted Praise

By Richard Pérez-Peña

New York Times, January 28, 2017

A group of Nobel Prize winners said it would damage American leadership in higher education and research. House Speaker Paul D. Ryan and some relatives of Americans killed in terrorist attacks said it was right on target. An evangelical Christian group called it an affront to human dignity.

The reaction on Saturday to President Trump's ban on refugees entering the United States, with particular focus on certain Muslim countries in the Middle East and Africa, was swift, certain — and sharply divided.

The order drew sharp and widespread condemnation Saturday from Democrats, religious groups, business leaders, academics and others, who called it inhumane, discriminatory and akin to taking a "wrecking ball to the Statue of Liberty." Thousands of professors from around the country, including several Nobel laureates, signed a statement opposing the president's action and calling it a "major step towards implementing the stringent racial and religious profiling promised on the campaign trail."

At a news conference in Paris, the foreign ministers of France and Germany, Jean-Marc Ayrault and Sigmar Gabriel, said they were worried by the restrictions. "Welcoming refugees who flee war and oppression is part of our duty," Mr. Ayrault said.

Immigration policy experts questioned the logic behind the action. They noted that terrorists who had carried out attacks in the United States had not entered as refugees, and that Muslim attackers had been people who were born here or came from countries like Pakistan or Saudi Arabia — which were not on the list of seven mostly Muslim countries that the administration has singled out for a complete halt to entry into the country. "Foreigners from those seven nations have killed zero Americans in terrorist attacks on U.S. soil between 1975 and the end of 2015," Alex Nowrasteh, an immigration policy analyst at the libertarian Cato Institute, wrote on the group's website.

Kathleen Newland, a senior fellow and co-founder of the Migration Policy Institute, a research group, said the new policy "will do damage not only to tens of thousands of refugees, but also to the reputation of this country as a reliable partner in the global humanitarian system."

But the president's executive order, issued on Friday, brought a positive, if more muted, reaction from Republicans, and could prove popular politically. During the presidential campaign, public opinion polls showed that about half of Americans favored the broader, more bluntly religion-based measure Mr. Trump originally called for, a ban on Muslims entering the country.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Michael Banerian, 22, who was a Trump elector in the Electoral College, and is the youth vice chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, said he saw the president's more narrowly tailored order as common sense. "I feel that it's a necessary step for us to take for the security of our nation," he said. "I don't think it's un-American. I think it's very reasonable."

Kathleen Ganci, 67, whose husband, Peter J. Ganci, the highest-ranking uniformed officer of the New York City Fire Department, was killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, said she supported the order "because I know the pain that can be caused if even one person gets through."

"I don't care how difficult it makes it for these people to come over," she said. "I don't want other Americans to go through what I did — because we have to care for our own first, before we care for others."

The executive order put an indefinite halt to citizens of Syria, a country racked by civil war and an immense refugee crisis, entering the United States. It suspended immigration for 90 days from countries linked to terrorism that the State Department said would mean seven Muslim-majority countries: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen. It also suspended the nation's program for admitting refugees from anywhere in the world for 120 days, while the government comes up with a stricter process for vetting them, but allowed for exceptions for persecuted religious minorities, like Christians in Muslim countries.

Mr. Trump said the moves were needed to protect the United States from the infiltration by "radical Islamic terrorists." Speaker Ryan released a statement saying, "President Trump is right to make sure we are doing everything possible to know exactly who is entering our country."

Many other leading congressional Republicans did not make statements on the matter, including Mitch McConnell, the Senate majority leader, whose aides said he had no plans to do so on Saturday. As reports began accumulating of legal migrants being stopped at airports in response to the president's order, some Republican aides on Capitol Hill started grumbling privately about how little the White House was defending its own policy.

The response from Democrats, however, was scathing. "This administration has mistaken cruelty for strength and prejudice for strategy," said Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic House minority leader. On Twitter, Senator Chris Murphy, Democrat of Connecticut, wrote: "To my colleagues: don't ever again lecture me on American moral leadership if you chose to be silent today."

The reaction was also largely negative from leaders of Silicon Valley, which relies heavily on employees from abroad, and has many companies founded or headed by immigrants or their children. A Google representative said, "We're concerned about the impact of this order and any proposals that could impose restrictions on Googlers and their families, or that could create barriers to bringing great talent to the U.S."

Google's chief executive, Sundar Pichai, a United States citizen who was born in India, sent a memo to the company's work force, saying that as many as 187 of its employees who happened to be overseas were affected by the travel restrictions. In the memo, first reported by Bloomberg News, Mr. Pichai urged affected employees to contact Google's security team, noting that one person rushed back from New Zealand before the order was signed.

Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg wrote on the site that the nation should "keep our doors open to refugees and those who need help."

Some colleges and universities had urged students who might be affected by Mr. Trump's policies to return to the United States before inauguration day if they were abroad, or to remain in the country if they were already here.

The seven countries covered by the temporary ban on entry to the United States have about 13,000 citizens who are college or graduate students in the United States, said the American Council on Education, the largest association of those schools. The group said it was unclear how many were stuck abroad. "The challenge is, it is clearly up to the federal government to decide how to safeguard our nation, but at the same time, it is in America's interest to remain the destination of choice for the world's students and scholars," said Terry W. Hartle, the group's executive vice president.

In interviews, news conferences and petitions, many religious leaders criticized what they called a decision to give preference to Christian refugees.

The president's action poses a particular challenge to Christian leaders who have hailed his anti-abortion stances, and whose followers have largely supported Mr. Trump, but whose organizations are among the most active on behalf of refugees. Most of the groups that the government uses to resettle refugees are religious. "Any limitation against any vulnerable population is to fly in the face of human dignity, of people made in the image of God," said Scott Arbeiter, the president of World Relief, a charity affiliated with the National Association of Evangelicals.

Jen Smyers, director of policy and advocacy for the immigration and refugee program of Church World Service, said that the executive order was "akin to President Trump taking a wrecking ball to the Statue of Liberty."

More Republicans Are Speaking Out Against Trump's Refugee Ban. Paul Ryan And Mitch McConnell Aren't Among Them.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Several congressional Republicans on Saturday questioned President Trump's order to halt admission to the U.S. by refugees and citizens of seven Muslim-majority countries, even as House Speaker Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.) continued to defend it.

Ryan was among the first lawmakers on Friday to back Trump's order, and his office reiterated his support on Saturday.

"This is not a religious test and it is not a ban on people of any religion," said spokeswoman AshLee Strong.

The order blocks citizens from Iran, Iraq, Syria, Yemen, Sudan, Somalia and Libya from entering the country for at least 90 days. It also bans refugees from anywhere in the world for 120 days — and from Syria indefinitely. Trump said that the goal is to screen out "radical Islamic terrorists" and that priority for admission would be given to Christians.

Republicans defending the executive order did so pointed to an exception for people already in transit and argued that some elements, including the religious minority preference, would not immediately be implemented. But as cable news footage brought scenes all day Saturday of chaos at airports around the country, where business travelers, students and even legal U.S. residents were being barred entry, other Republicans began weighing in.

"This is ridiculous," said Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.). "I guess I understand what his intention is, but unfortunately the order appears to have been rushed through without full consideration. You know, the many, many nuances of immigration policy that can be life or death for many innocent, vulnerable people around the world

"I understand what his intention is," of the president. "But the order appears to have been rushed though without consideration. This is life and death for people around the world."

Dent, who represents a large Syrian community in the Allentown area, said he was contacted Saturday by a constituent who had family members turned away early in the morning at Philadelphia International Airport. Six family members who had secured visas and even bought a house in Pennsylvania arrived on a Qatar Airways flight but were returned back within hours, he said.

Dent called on the Trump administration to halt immediately action on the order.

"This family was sent home despite having all their paperwork in order," Dent continued, "so this 90-day ban could imperil the lives of this family and potentially others, and it's unacceptable ,and I urge the administration to halt enforcement of this order until a more thoughtful and deliberate policy can be reinstated."

House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Ed Royce (R-Calif.) said Saturday that he backs the order but hopes for some resolution for those who were in transit as the order was announced.

"Pausing the intake of refugees from terror hotspots is the right call to keep America safe," Royce said. "I hope cases of individuals with visas traveling as this executive action went into effect — including some who served alongside U.S. troops — will be resolved quickly."

Some conservatives worried that denying entry to permanent residents and green card holders could violate the Constitution. Many worried privately that the order will face significant challenges in court. Rep. Justin Amash (R-Mich.) was among the few GOP members to air his concerns publicly. Amash posted on Twitter that the order "overreaches" and "undermines" the Constitution.

"It's not lawful to ban immigrants on basis of nationality," Amash tweeted. "If the president wants to change immigration law, he must work with Congress."

Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.) credited Trump with properly focusing on protecting the country's borders and said it is necessary to connect "jihadi terrorism" with Islam and particular countries. However, he also noted that the order is "too broad."

"If we send a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. sees all Muslims as jihadis, the terrorist recruiters win by telling kids that America is banning Muslims and that this is America versus one religion," Sasse said. "Our generational fight against jihadism requires wisdom."

The statement from Ryan's office came after several requests seeking comment on how the order differs from the Muslim ban that Ryan rejected during the campaign, whether such a ban is in line with American values and if Ryan is concerned that the order is a first step towards a religious litmus test.

Ryan has been a consistent advocate for increased vetting standards and has frequently said he opposes a complete ban on Muslims entering the country.

"Freedom of religion is a fundamental constitutional principle. It's a founding principle of this country," Ryan told reporters following a closed-door morning meeting at the Republican National Committee in December of 2015. "This is not conservatism. What was proposed yesterday is not what this party stands for. And more importantly, it's not what this country stands for."

The majority of Republicans in Congress were silent on the order Saturday — including Senate Majority Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Calls and emails to more than a dozen top GOP lawmakers were not returned. Only one Republican senator contacted for this story had responded at the time of publication.

Conservative advocacy groups, meanwhile, generally supported Trump's actions.

In an interview Saturday with The Post, Faith and Freedom Coalition Chairman Ralph Reed defended Trump's executive order, calling it an "entirely prudent move" and rejecting the notion that it amounts to a ban on Muslims or infringes on religious liberties.

"It makes perfect sense not to try to build the airplane in the air," said Reed, who advocated hitting "the pause button" on current practices on immigration and refugee policies, over concerns about terrorism.

Congressional aides who did respond generally insisted that Trump was merely adopting a policy that passed the House last year with a veto-proof majority. The seven countries named in the order are currently included in the list of as "countries of concern" by the Department of Homeland Security. People who have traveled to or lived in those countries were already subject to additional scrutiny when applying for visa waivers.

One senior GOP aide said in an email that the executive order was "narrow, a faint shadow of the policy Trump ran on."

The silence is a major departure from the outrage many Republicans expressed when Trump floated a Muslim ban during the campaign. At the time, several leading Republicans, including Ryan and McConnell said proposals to bar visitors based on religion are "completely inconsistent" with American values.

Statements trickled in slowly Saturday as lawmakers and government agencies scrambled to make sense of how the order would be applied. Confusion over the directive played out at airports across the country as immigration officials attempted to decide how to handle refugees and travellers from those seven nations who were already in transit or on the ground when the exeutive order was issued.

Several news outlets reported instances of travelers being detained in airports, including Hameed Khalid Darweesh, a 53 year old Iraqi man who spent several years acting as an interpreter for the U.S. Army in Iraw. Darweesh was released from detention in New York's John F. Kennedy airport after two New York Democrats, Reps. Jerry Nadler and Nydia Valazquez, intervened on his behalf.

Several Congressional aides who spoke on condition of anonymity said Saturday that the executive order itself does not single out a preference for Christians, and the temporary travel ban is focused on areas where terrorism is a particular concern. One senior aide dismissed as "false" accusations that the order constitutes a blanket policy against Muslims or Muslim-majority nations.

The House voted last year on legislation to suspend the admission of refugees from Syria and Iraq until the White House could certify that no person entering the United States would pose a security threat. Democrats blocked a vote on the legislation in the Senate and it ultimately failed to reach President Obama's desk.

Aides also said it is not uncommon for an administration to prioritize refu-gee requests on the basis of religious persecution. However, since the beginning of the -Syrian civil war and the rise of the Islamic State, many more Muslims than Christians have been killed or displaced because of the violence.

Additionally, a 2015 Washington Post poll found that 78 percent of Americans favored equal consideration for refugees regardless of religion.

Ryan said Friday that while he supports the refu-gee resettlement program, he thinks it is time to "reevaluate and strengthen the visa vetting process."

"President Trump is right to make sure we are doing everything possible to know exactly who is entering our country," the speaker said Friday.

Other Republicans offered similar support for the order on national seceurity grounds.

"President Trump signed an order to help prevent jihadists from infiltrating the United States," House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Michael McCaul (R-Texas) said in a statement. "With the stroke of a pen, he is doing more to shut down terrorist pathways into this country than the last Administration did in eight years."

Evan McMullin, a former CIA officer and House GOP policy director who waged an independent presidential bid in 2016, was one of a small number of Republicans to publicly oppose the ban. McMullin tweeted a photo of the Statue of Liberty on Saturday morning, and was promptly mocked by the white nationalist Richard Spencer.

"That's who they're in league with — white supremacists and white nationalists," McMullin said in an interview. "I'm not expecting much opposition from the vast majority of Republicans in Congress. There is anti-Muslim bigotry at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue and it fundamentally un-American and tangibly damaging to our national security and strength."

Most Republicans, McMullin predicted, would decline to criticize the executive orders. "Those who are silent on this will be defined by that silence," he said.

A Very Few Republicans Finally Criticize Trump's Refugee And Travel Ban

Most GOP members aren't talking about it at all.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000283

By Elise Foley

WASHINGTON — Five Republican members of Congress broke with most of their party and President Donald Trump on Saturday by condemning his executive order to bar refugees and citizens of seven Muslim-majority countries.

Sens. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.), Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine), along with Reps. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) and Justin Amash (R-Mich.), said they opposed Trump's executive order, which has already wreaked havoc on the lives of refugees, travelers, immigrants and even U.S. citizens whose family members will now be barred from visiting them.

"I urge the admin to halt enforcement of this order until a more thoughtful and deliberate policy can be instated," Dent, a Trump critic who represents a large Syrian community, told The New York Times' Jonathan Martin.

Sasse said the order was too broad and potentially dangerous, even if it wasn't technically the blanket Muslim ban that Trump once proposed.

"If we send a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. sees all Muslims as jihadis, the terrorist recruiters win by telling kids that America is banning Muslims and that this is America versus one religion," Sasse said in a statement.

Amash said the executive order was unlawful because such a policy change should have gone through Congress.

Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), who is third in line for the presidency, issued a statement Saturday night urging the Trump administration to "move quickly to tailor its policy."

Dent told The New York Times that some of his constituents' family members were informed they could not enter the U.S. when they touched down at Philadelphia International Airport. In fact, many refugees, visitors and even green card holders who reside in the U.S. have been turned away in the 24 hours since Trump's order was issued.

Flake spoke out against the executive order later on Saturday.

"President Trump and his administration are right to be concerned about national security, but it's unacceptable when even legal permanent residents are being detained or turned away at airports and ports of entry," Flake said in a statement. "Enhancing long term national security requires that we have a clear-eyed view of radical Islamic terrorism without ascribing radical Islamic terrorist views to all Muslims."

Collins told Maine's Sun Journal that the refugee ban "is overly broad and implementing it will be immediately problematic."

Trump's executive order suspends refugee resettlement entirely for 120 days, bans Syrian refugees indefinitely and temporarily bars individuals from seven countries: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen. Legal permanent residents, also called green card holders, from those same countries can be admitted only on a case-by-case basis, according to the White House. Dual-nationals of those countries — a British-Iranian citizen, for example — are barred from entry.

Most Republicans in Congress have said nothing about the ban, which is unusual because most controversial White House policy announcements are met with either applause or criticism.

Only a few Republicans have issued statements. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), who forcefully condemned Trump's call for a Muslim ban in 2015, said this time that "President Trump is right to make sure we are doing everything possible to know exactly who is entering our country." A spokeswoman for Ryan told The Huffington Post that Trump's order did not constitute a ban on Muslims, pushing back on the idea that Ryan's past statement was relevant to the current situation.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) and House Homeland Security Chairman Michael McCaul (R-Texas) also put out statements saying Trump did the right thing. The vast majority of Republicans remained silent.

This article has been updated to include comments from Sens. Jeff Flake and Susan Collins.

Republicans Go Largely Silent As Trump Bars Refugees And Immigrants From U.S.

But Paul Ryan is speaking up – in favor of a Muslim ban he used to condemn.

By Jennifer Bendery

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON — There's been thunderous outcry on Capitol Hill in the hours since President Donald Trump signed an executive order on Friday stopping Muslims and refugees from entering the U.S.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) said "tears are running down the cheeks of the Statue of Liberty" as the U.S. turns aways immigrants.

Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Conn.) warned that the president "just handed ISIS a path to rebirth."

Rep. Seth Moulton (D-Mass.), a Marine veteran, said that Trump's action puts U.S. troops' lives at risk and that Moulton is "ashamed that he is our president."

"History will judge where America's leaders stood today," lamented Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.).

That's just a sampling of dozens of statements being fired out by Democrats. On the Republican side, the reaction is significantly different: silence.

GOP lawmakers, who now control both chambers of Congress, have gone quiet in response to the president's unilateral action that bans Syrian refugee resettlement in the U.S. indefinitely, shuts down the nation's entire refugee program for 120 days, and bars all immigrants and visitors from seven Muslim-majority countries from entering the U.S. for at least 90 days.

As The New York Times' Glenn Thrush observed on Twitter, Republicans haven't been this quiet "since the last positive jobs report under Obama." HuffPost spotted statements from just four GOP members of Congress, all in support of Trump's move. One of them, Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Texas), said it's important to deny refugees entry "to help prevent jihadists from infiltrating the United States."

It's worth noting that the U.S. refugee screening process is already very intensive. The likelihood of being killed by a refugee terrorist in the U.S. is 1 in 3.6 billion, per a new Cato Institute report.

The smattering of Republicans who issued statements didn't raise concerns about the fact that Trump had effectively imposed a religious test for traveling to the United States. The president's order was already causing chaos at U.S. airports, as refugees and immigrants arrived late Friday or Saturday, only to be detained or told they can't enter the country.

It's not just rank-and file Republicans trying to duck the issue. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) hasn't said a peep. His counterpart, House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), is one of the handful who did respond to Trump's action — by supporting it, while simultaneously saying America is a "compassionate" nation.

"Our number one responsibility is to protect the homeland. We are a compassionate nation, and I support the refugee resettlement program, but it's time to reevaluate and strengthen the visa vetting process," Ryan said. "This is why we passed bipartisan legislation in the wake of the Paris attacks to pause the intake of refugees. President Trump is right to make sure we are doing everything possible to know exactly who is entering our country."

It was just months ago that Ryan was condemning Trump's campaign trail threat to institute a Muslim ban. Back then, when few expected Trump to win the election, Ryan said targeting immigrants didn't reflect "America's fundamental values."

Before he was vice president, Mike Pence, too, denounced the idea of banning an entire group of people from the country based on their religion. Here he is in December 2015, when he was governor of Indiana:

On Saturday, Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong pushed back on the idea that Trump's action targets Muslims.

"This is not a religious test and it is not a ban on people of any religion," she said.

The difference between then and now is that Trump is the president. Republican Party leaders like Ryan and McConnell appear willing to give him a pass on whatever extreme actions he wants to take — instituting a Muslim ban, directing Congress to spend billions to build a wall along the Mexican border — as long as he helps them pass laws they want pass, like cutting taxes for corporations and repealing the Affordable Care Act. These are types of things Republicans have been itching to do, but couldn't under President Barack Obama.

It remains to be seen when, or if, Republicans will draw a line on embracing Trump's controversial and, in this case, racist actions. When even hawkish former Vice President Dick Cheney has suggested Trump's ideas go too far, it appears there is a line somewhere.

"This whole notion that somehow we can just say no more Muslims, just ban a whole religion, goes against everything we stand for and believe in," Cheney said in December 2015.

This story has been updated with comment from Ryan spokeswoman AshLee Strong.

CORRECTION: Dick Cheney condemned Trump's proposed Muslim ban in December 2015, not his executive order on Friday.

GOP Critics Hit Trump Immigration Order

By John Bresnahan

Politico, January 28, 2017

Several Republicans have come out in opposition to President Donald Trump's executive order barring immigrants from seven Muslim-majority nations, criticizing it as "overly broad" or poorly conceived.

Yet most Republicans, especially those on Capitol Hill, have kept silent, declining to publicly comment on a hugely controversial move by Trump that many party leaders had harshly criticized when he first raised it during the presidential campaign.

And Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), once a harsh critic of any ban on Muslim immigration, came out in defense of the president's order. Senior GOP congressional aides said that Trump's action was not targeted specifically at Muslims and therefore did not mean the White House was imposing a religious test on refugees.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) would not comment on Trump's order. McConnell plans to make his position known during a Sunday morning TV interview.

Democrats across the country reacted with fury over Trump's declaration, and they vowed to fight the order legally and politically.

Trump's executive order, issued on Friday night, calls for a temporary halt to the admission of people from seven Muslim-majority countries; a temporary ban on all refugees; and an indefinite ban on Syrian refugees.

There is also a directive that religious minorities from those Muslim-majority countries, which by implication means Christians in many cases, get priority among refugees eventually admitted to the United States.

Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.), who clashed with Trump during the campaign, said the order could hurt U.S. standing with Muslims worldwide.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

According to Sasse, "while not technically a Muslim ban, the order is too broad. There are two ways to lose our generational battle against jihadism by losing touch with reality. The first is to keep pretending that jihadi terrorism has no connection to Islam or to certain countries. That's been a disaster. And here's the second way to fail: If we send a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. sees all Muslims as jihadis, the terrorists win by telling kids that America is banning Muslims and this is America versus one religion."

Rep. Charlie Dent (Pa.), one of the few remaining GOP moderates in the House, was upset about a Syrian refugee family turned away by U.S. immigration authorities at Philadelphia's airport.

In a statement, Dent said, "A Syrian Christian family who, according to family members in my district, held valid visas and were not refugees, yet were detained at the Philadelphia International Airport and then forced to leave the country as a result of the Executive Order. This family now faces the uncertain prospect of being sent back to Syria."

Dent called the episode "unacceptable and I urge the administration to halt enforcement of the order until a more thoughtful and deliberate policy can be instated."

Rep. Justin Amash (R-Mich.), a frequent critic of executive power, objected to Trump's action in a series of statements on Twitter.

"The president's denial of entry to lawful permanent residents of the United States (green card holders) is particularly troubling," Amash said. "We must do much more to properly vet refugees, but a blanket ban represents an extreme approach not consistent with our nation's values."

Ryan was one of the few Republicans to openly praise Trump's order.

"We are a compassionate nation, and I support the refugee resettlement program, but it's time to reevaluate and strengthen the visa vetting process. This is why we passed bipartisan legislation in the wake of the Paris attacks to pause the intake of refugees," Ryan said in a statement. "President Trump is right to make sure we are doing everything possible to know exactly who is entering our country."

When pressed on whether this is a reversal by Ryan, who previously said he did not support any effort to bar Muslim immigration, an aide to the Wisconsin Republican noted Muslims are not explicitly targeted or singled out in the Trump order.

"This is not a religious test and it is not a ban on people of any religion," AshLee Strong, Ryan's spokeswoman, insisted.

A senior GOP congressional aide noted that Trump's order is focused on fighting terrorism and preventing potential terrorists from getting into the country, something the American public strongly backs.

The aide also said the order did not affect refugees or visa applicants in the "vast majority" of Muslim nations.

"The visa suspension is focused only on those nations where terrorism is a particular concern," the aide said. "And the refugee program suspension, other than for Syria, is applied to all countries. To suggest that is a blanket policy on Muslims or Muslim-majority nations is false."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.), a hardliner on the issue of Syrian refugees, also backed Trump's move.

"The primary duty of the federal government is to keep Americans safe. Today, President Trump has begun to fulfill this responsibility by taking a number of critical steps within his authority to strengthen national security and the integrity of our nation's immigration system," Goodlatte said. "As ISIS terrorists have vowed to use the immigration system to inflict harm, it's imperative that we know who is coming and going from our country. National security officials have repeatedly warned that we dramatically lack the resources and information to fully vet refugees from countries of concern, like Syria.

With reports that refugees were being held up at U.S. airports, including some who had aided U.S. soldiers fighting in Iraq and elsewhere, Democrats rushed to try to intervene.

New York Democratic Reps. Jerrold Nadler and Nydia Velazquez went to John F. Kennedy Airport to help a group of men who had been prevented from entering the country.

According to a statement from the two Democrats, "after meeting with officials from the Custom and Border Patrol agency, one of the refugees, Hameed Khalid Darweesh, an Iraqi translator who helped the United States government, was released. Reps. Velazquez and Nadler are still working to release 11 others being held at JFK under the new executive order.

"The order almost banned a man from entering the country who has worked for the United States government for 10 years, who risked his life to help us and to help our troops, and who loves our country," said the two Democrats. "Thankfully, we did not sit idly by. We took action. We demanded his release, and the release of the others who are being unlawfully detained. We are pleased to announce that Hameed Khalid Darweesh has been released and can now be reunited with his family."

The lawmakers said they were working to get 11 more men released from custody.

"This should not happen in America," Nadler and Velazquez said. "We shouldn't have to demand the release of refugees one by one. We must fight this executive order in the streets, in the courts, anywhere, anytime."

Democrats Slam Trump's Immigration Ban As Callous And Cruel

The Statue of Liberty is crying, Nancy Pelosi said.

By Sam Levine

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

Democratic lawmakers harshly and unequivocally condemned President Donald Trump's executive order Friday that blocks refugees from entering the United States and bars all people coming from seven Muslim-majority countries.

The widespread criticism from Democrats contrasted sharply with the response from Republicans, who went largely silent after Trump signed the order.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said there were tears in the eyes of the Statue of Liberty over the president's action.

"As the Statue of Liberty holds her torch of welcome high, there are tears in her eyes as she sees how low this Administration has stooped in its callousness toward mothers and children escaping war-torn Syria. This Administration has mistaken cruelty for strength and prejudice for strategy," Pelosi said in a statement.

Trump's order did nothing to address threats of terrorism, Pelosi added. There have been no terror attacks on U.S. soil from individuals from the seven countries specifically targeted by the president's action.

Sens. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) both argued that the order would actually make America less safe.

Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), the first Muslim elected to Congress, said the executive order "runs contrary to everything we cherish about America."

"To all those afraid: you are not alone. We are with you. And we will fight for you," Ellison said in a statement.

Rep. Seth Moulton (D-Mass.), a Marine veteran, said he was "ashamed" that Trump was president.

"His policies literally put our troops' lives at risk — I've heard this loud and clear when I have visited them overseas. They also prove he has zero understanding of our country's values and no intention of defending our Constitution," Moulton said in a statement. "We are a nation of immigrants, and America is stronger when we welcome the refugees of our enemies. These policies do not put America first. I am ashamed that he is our president."

Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) tweeted that she was nauseated after reading about Hameed Khalid Darweesh, a man who had worked on behalf of the United States in Iraq for 10 years but was still detained at New York's JFK Airport on Friday night.

Reps. Jerry Nadler and Nydia Velazquez, both New York Democrats, went to the airport on Saturday to try to intervene on behalf of multiple individuals who had been detained because of Trump's executive order. Nadler later tweeted a picture of him and Velazquez with Darweesh, who had been released.

"What is happening at JFK International Airport right now is an affront to American values. This harkens back to a previous dark episode in our nation's history when we turned away Jewish refugees seeking safe harbor from the horrors of Nazism. I will not and cannot stand idly by as the Trump administration begins repeating such unconscionable acts," Velazquez said in a statement.

Trump had initially discussed his proposal to ban Muslims from entering the United States in December 2015, prompting broad condemnation even from Republicans.

Schumer Calls For Trump Admin To 'Rescind' Refugee Order

By Jesse Byrnes

The Hill, January 28, 2017

Senate Minority Leader Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) is calling on the Trump administration to back off the president's sweeping order barring many refugees after a number of detentions at U.S. airports Saturday.

Schumer said that he called Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly on Saturday "to urge the administration to rescind these anti-American executive actions that will do absolutely nothing to improve our safety."

"In fact, they will do the opposite. We have a long and proud tradition of accepting refugees who seek safety in the United States, after a long and thorough vetting process. That tradition should continue," he said.

"These executive orders were mean-spirited and un-American in their origin, and implemented in a way that has caused chaos and confusion across the country. They will only serve to embolden and inspire those around the globe who would do us harm. They must be reversed, immediately," Schumer added.

The Democratic leader's statement came after two refugees were detained at John F. Kennedy International Airport on Friday after Trump's order went into effect.

The American Civil Liberties Union and other legal groups filed a lawsuit on behalf of two Iraqi refugees detained and threatened with deportation at JFK early Saturday morning.

Hameed Jhalid Darweesh, who worked for the U.S. government in Iraq for 10 years, was blocked from entering the U.S. when he landed at JFK on Friday night. He was later released.

Democratic Reps. Nydia Velazquez (D-N.Y.) and Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) worked to secure his release on Saturday as reports emerged that a number of other refugees were being detained.

Trump defended his order on Saturday amid chaos as the administration moved to implement his directive, which was handed down Friday evening and bars Syrian refugees indefinitely while halting the resettlement of all refugees for four months.

It also blocks entry for 90 days for individuals coming from Iraq, Iran, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Libya and Yemen.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Department of Homeland Security said Saturday the order also applies to green card holders from the seven impacted countries. A senior administration official clarified green card holders from countries outside the U.S. could receive a waiver on a case-by-case basis.

'Lady Liberty Is Crying,' Democrats Declare In Wake Of Trump's Visa, Asylum Executive Order

By Andrew Blake

Washington Times, January 28, 2017

Democratic leadership in the House and Senate slammed President Trump's signing of a broad executive order targeting refugees Friday as antithetical to the nation's tradition of welcoming "huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

"As the Statue of Liberty holds her torch of welcome high, there are tears in her eyes as she sees how low this Administration has stooped in its callousness toward mothers and children escaping war-torn Syria," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said Friday.

"Tears are running down the cheeks of the Statue of Liberty tonight as a grand tradition of America, welcoming immigrants, that has existed since America was founded has been stomped upon," Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, New York Democrat, said in a statement of his own.

The lawmakers' comments came within hours of Mr. Trump issuing an executive order Friday effectively closing the United States' borders to citizens from seven Muslim-majority countries as part of what the president has touted as a plan to eradicate Islamic terrorism as promised on the campaign trail. The order temporarily bars entry to citizens of Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen, as well as suspending accepting Syrian asylum seekers "until such time as I have determined that sufficient changes have been made … to ensure that admission of Syrian refugees is consistent with the national interest."

Other Democrats similarly denounced the president's order into the weekend, contrasting his so-called "Muslim Ban" with the credo that has greeted millions of immigrants arriving in the U.S. by way of Ellis Island and its neighboring landmark, the Statue of Liberty.

"Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free, the wretched refuse of your teeming shore. Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me, I lift my lamp beside the golden door!" reads a sonnet inscribed on the base of the statue.

"Trump's action is not based on national security, it is based on bigotry. Lady Liberty is crying." Rep. Ted Lieu, California Democrat, said in a statement Friday.

"I can think of few things more un-American than discriminating against people seeking refuge on our shores because of their religion. This action betrays who we are as a country and makes us less safe," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat.

The libertarian Cato Institute said in a report last year that 20 of the 3.2 million refugees admitted into the U.S. between 1975 and 2015 were terrorists, amounting to around 0.00062 percent of total refugees allowed.

Dem: Feds Need To Explain Refugee Order

By Max Greenwood

The Hill, January 28, 2017

A Democratic lawmaker is urging the Department of Homeland Security to release an explanation of President Trump's executive order blocking admissions of citizens from seven Muslim-majority countries and what the action means for travelers.

In a letter to Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) blasted Trump's order, saying that it ran counter to "the principles of religious liberty, equality, and compassion that our nation was founded upon."

"In its discriminatory impact of Muslims, it also plays into the Al Qaeda and ISIS narrative that the West is no place for Muslims and that we are engaged in a war of civilizations," Schiff said, referring to the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria.

"The capricious enforcement of this order is likely to heighten its harmful effects and present legal and constitutional issues," he added.

Schiff also demanded to be notified if any refugees were being detained at Los Angeles International Airport, which is part of his district, saying his office would provide assistance to anyone having difficulty navigating any roadblocks they may face.

"The Department of Homeland Security must immediately make available a full explanation of the order and its implications for travelers. It is unconscionable that such an order would be released without warning, effective immediately, a decision that can only seem designed to maximize suffering," he said.

"DHS must spell out plainly the order and ensure it is available to travelers and Americans, hundreds of thousands of whom now fear for themselves and their loved ones."

Schiff's letter comes amid wide backlash to Trump's executive order handed down Friday that halts the country's refugee resettlement program for 120 days and bars people from seven predominantly Muslim countries from traveling to the U.S.

The order stirred controversy almost immediately. Reports of refugees being detained upon their arrival at U.S. airports prompted a lawsuit against the Trump administration by several legal groups, and Democratic lawmakers scrambled to call for the president to rescind the measure.

Many civil-rights groups and Democratic lawmakers compared the order to Trump's campaign proposal in late 2015 to temporarily ban Muslims from entering the U.S., but Trump on Saturday denied that his order amounted to a "Muslim ban."

Keith Ellison, First Muslim Congressman, Calls For 'mass Rallies' To Stop Trump Orders

By David Weigel

HOUSTON — Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), who in 2007 became the first Muslim member of Congress, said in an interview Saturday that opponents of President Trump's executive orders on immigration and refugees should oppose them in the streets.

"It's time for people to get active, to get involved, to vote and to organize," said Ellison, who was in Houston to campaign for chairman of the Democratic National Committee. "Trump must be stopped, and people power is what we have at our disposal to make him stop. We need mass rallies. We need them all over the country. We need them in Texas. We need them in D.C. We need them in Minnesota."

Ellison, one of the first candidates to enter the DNC race, is also the most politically prominent member of a faith singled out in Trump's executive orders temporarily halting the visa interview process from seven nations and the refugee flow from Syria. On Friday, before heading to Houston, he joined a rally in Miami-Dade County against plans for it to cooperate in Trump's crackdown on sanctuary cities; former labor secretary Tom Perez, seen as the other front-runner in the DNC race, responded to Trump's plan to investigate "voter fraud" with an op-ed about Texas's experience chasing after phantom fraud cases.

Once in Houston, Ellison found himself zipping between meetings with DNC members while Muslim legal groups were collecting stories of stranded refugees and working, in vain so far, to reunite them with families.

"I've heard from people who were on the way to Minnesota and were blocked," said Ellison. "They're stopping people at the border right now. They're breaking up families now. This is an absolute affront to America as a welcoming nation that gives refuge to suffering people. It is basically sending a positive signal to people who hate this country, because now ISIS gets to say — 'See? They don't want you.' They get to whip up hate and anti-American sentiment."

While no Republican members of Congress have spoken out against last night's executive orders, Ellison pointed out that his colleagues had opposed them in the past — before the 2016 election.

"Speaker Ryan said that using religion as a criteria for any treatment of people is wrong an un-American," said Ellison. "Well, Trump said he wanted a Muslim ban. He has selected only Muslim countries to ban people. We can't tolerate it."

Sanders: Trump 'Fostering Hatred' With Refugee Ban

By Max Greenwood

The Hill, January 28, 2017

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) on Saturday accused President Trump of "fostering hatred" with his executive order barring people from certain Muslim-majority countries from entering the U.S.

"Trump's anti-Muslim order plays into the hands of fanatics wishing to harm America. Love and compassion trump hatred and intolerance," Sanders tweeted.

"Demagogues survive by fostering hatred. We won't allow anyone to divide us up by our religion, country of origin or the color of our skin," he added.

Trump signed an executive action Friday barring people from seven Muslim-majority countries from traveling to the U.S., and halting the country's Syrian refugee resettlement program.

The president has argued that the move will help protect the U.S. from terrorists that use the resettlement program to enter the country. But opponents argue that the action eviscerates a program that provides vital assistance to refugees, and ultimately empowers terrorist organizations.

Warren Goes On Tweetstorm Over Refugee Ban

By Brooke Seipel

The Hill, January 27, 2017

Massachusetts Democratic Senator Elizabeth Warren went on a tweetstorm against President Trump Friday night for his executive order that calls for new vetting of refugees and those seeking to enter the U.S. from certain Muslim-majority countries, and a complete ban on refugees from Syria.

Trump's order declares that "the entry of nationals of Syria as refugees is detrimental to the interests of the United States" and suspends their entry until the president has determined that their entry "is consistent with the national interest."

"Let's be clear: A Muslim ban by any other name is still a Muslim ban," Warren said in her series of tweets. "Donald Trump's order restricting immigrants from Muslim countries & freezing admission of refugees is a betrayal of American values."

Trump is also imposing a 90-day ban on entry to the U.S. for visitors hailing from "countries of particular concern" when it comes to terrorism. The order does not list specific countries that would fall under the ban, but the Department of Homeland Security said they included Iran, Sudan, Syria, Libya, Somalia, Yemen and Iraq.

When refugee admissions resume, Trump ordered his administration to prioritize claims "made by individuals on the basis of religious-based persecution, provided that the religion of the individual is a minority religion in the individual's country of nationality."

That would allow the Trump administration to put Christians from Muslim-majority nations first in line for refugee status, a drastic shift from the policy under former President Barack Obama.

Warren's statements join those of other prominent party members such as Senate minority leader Chuck Schumer and California Sen. Kamala Harris.

How Trump Just Made America Less Safe

The president just handed ISIS a path to rebirth.

By Sen. Chris Murphy

Donald Trump's long-awaited Muslim ban became a reality today. No, you might say, it's not actually the proposal he outlined during the campaign. True, the ban doesn't cover every Muslim globally, just a set of Muslims from countries Trump perceives, rather arbitrarily, to be dangerous.

But today's announcement is anchored in his campaign rhetoric, and the fact that every country on today's list is a Muslim-majority nation confirms that he meant what he said – that Muslims are dangerous and need to be treated differently than any other set of people.

This is why today's proposal is likely to get Americans killed.

ISIS, the most dangerous of a global array of radical Islamic terrorist groups, is in retreat. Every day, they lose more territory, and it is only a matter of time before their self-proclaimed caliphate disappears before the world's eyes. The continual loss of territory robs from ISIS one of their two main rationales for existence – the creation of a geographic entity based on their perverted interpretation of Islam.

But ISIS has a second purpose – to take part in an imagined global struggle of civilizations between Christians and Muslims. President Obama and President Bush before him knew the danger of stoking talk of war between east and west. Obama knew how important this kind of talk was to ISIS's recruitment and expansion, and he went out of his way to tamp it down.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The decision to turn our backs on millions of men, women, and children attempting to flee torture and terror shrinks us as a nation, and marks an unconscionable abandonment of our founding principles.

Trump has now handed ISIS a path to rebirth. They can and will use his announcement today as confirmation that America is at war with Muslims, especially those Muslims living in desperate circumstances. Their recruitment bulletin boards will light up with new material. Their entreaties to would-be lone wolf attackers in America will have new energy and purpose.

All the work we have done to cut down on extremist recruitment at home and abroad now goes out the window. It's a new day for terrorist recruiters.

And the list is dangerous for other reasons. It makes Americans think that terrorists can be contained simply by focusing on a few countries that are often in the news. But the real threats to America are much broader than just these countries. Where is Saudi Arabia on this list? Or Pakistan? Does Trump not recall that the attackers on September 11th came not from Syria or Iran or Sudan, but from Saudi Arabia, our supposed ally? And what about Europe, a continent that now enjoys relatively unfettered travel rights to the United States? Radicalized European citizens have already carried out massive terrorist attacks, and under current law, they can travel to the U.S. without almost any security screening. Terrorist threats do not originate in one set of countries, and thus a geographic approach is feckless.

If President Trump was serious about tackling the terrorist threat, he would make sure the Europeans were sharing counterterrorism intelligence with each other, and with us, so we can track potential terrorists no matter what country they come from. Another commonsense measure would be to ban people on the terrorist watch list from buying deadly firearms in America. But rather than do any of these things that would actually make Americans safer, Trump is pursuing misguided policies rooted in bigotry and fear.

And the boon to flailing terrorist groups is just the beginning of the tragedy of today's announcement. During my last trip to the Middle East, I was upbraided by our allies in the region for our country's refusal to help them with the flow of refugees out of Iraq and Syria. Over and over they told me, as they had told the Obama administration, that we would never be perceived a partner in the fight against Islamic extremism if we washed our hands of the refugee problem.

We assail Libya and Yemen and Syria and Iraq with bombs, and then simply expect other countries to deal with the consequences. We make the mess, then expect others to clean up. This infuriates our friends and damages our partnerships. Now, Trump's Muslim ban will risk severing ties between us and many of these nations. They will see our policy as xenophobic and detrimental to the displaced persons crisis in the region. Our ability to build a truly multi-national response to extremism will become impossible.

We assail Libya and Yemen and Syria and Iraq with bombs, and then simply expect other countries to deal with the consequences.

Finally, the decision to turn our backs on millions of men, women, and children attempting to flee torture and terror shrinks us as a nation, and marks an unconscionable abandonment of our founding principles. Remember, those who make it into the U.S. refugee program have survived the worst of the worst – they are those who are so badly injured, so in danger, that they cannot survive in refugee camps. The vast majority of them are women, young children and the elderly. They are desperate and scared, and without harbor in the United States, many of them will perish.

We are a nation founded by religious refugees. Over and over, we have opened our doors to those fleeing war and terror. Jews during the Second World War. The Vietnamese in the 1960s and 1970s. Bosnians and Albanians during the Balkan War. I am proud to represent Connecticut, a state which is a testament to this past practice. Each time we found ways to sort out the good guys (99%) from the bad guys (1 percent). There were terrorists in Vietnam and the Balkans who wanted in – we kept them out. We can do the same here. We can protect ourselves from terror and rescue others from terror – these are not mutually exclusive ends.

And we must do both. Trump's Muslim ban is a moral abomination. It is fundamentally un-American. And it is dangerous – it will give life back to the terrorist movement and eventually get Americans killed.

We knew today was coming. Trump means what he says, and now his offensive ramblings against people of Muslim faith are edified in law. But we don't have to accept it. We must fight this new policy. We must seek to rescind it. We must let the world know that Trump's discriminatory views do not reflect the true America. And we must rally Americans who think that keeping Muslims out keeps us safe to understand that this policy does exactly the opposite.

This isn't who we are. It's not who we should be. And I will fight this policy with all that I have.

Iran Retaliates, Canada Opens Arms After Trump Immigration Ban

By Bill Keveney

USA Today, January 28, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000291

World leaders reacted harshly Saturday to President Trump's executive order suspending immigration and visas for citizens from certain countries with majority Muslim populations. Iran, one of the targeted nations, suggested it would limit issuing visas to American tourists.

Trump on Friday suspended all refugee admissions to the U.S. for four months and banned the entry of Syrian refugees indefinitely pending a security review meant to ensure terrorists cannot slip through vetting. Trump also issued a 90-day ban on all entry to the U.S. from seven Muslim-majority countries with terrorism concerns, including Syria.

The official IRNA news agency Saturday carried a statement by the Iranian foreign ministry that says Iran will resort to "counteraction" to Trump's executive order.

"Iran, to defend the dignity of the great Iranian nation, will implement the principle of reciprocity until the removal of the insulting restriction against Iranian nationals," the statement reads. "It will apply corresponding legal, consular and political actions."

The two countries have had no diplomatic relations since 1979 when militants stormed the U.S. embassy.

Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif issued a series of tweets in response to President Trump's order, saying the move would be "a great gift to extremists and their supporters."

He explained that statement further, tweeting: "Collective discrimination aids terrorist recruitment by deepening fault-lines exploited by extremist demagogues to swell their ranks."

A follow-up tweet promised a reciprocal response: "While respecting Americans & differentiating between them & hostile U.S. policies, Iran will take reciprocal measures to protect citizens."

Other world leaders, including officials from Canada and Scotland, also tweeted responses to the new U.S. policy.

Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau embraced refugees, also temporarily prohibited from entering the U.S., making a pointed comment about not discriminating on religious grounds: "To those fleeing persecution, terror & war, Canadians will welcome you, regardless of your faith. Diversity is our strength #WelcomeToCanada"

Nicola Sturgeon, first minister of Scotland, retweeted Trudeau, seconding his invitation: "#WelcometoScotland too."

People in the affected countries reacted with dismay to the U.S. move, the Associated Press reported.

"I am shocked beyond words. This will mean that my new husband will never be able to join me in the U.S.," said Fatima Ashkir, a Somali-American woman from Florida who came to Mogadishu to marry her Somali boyfriend.

In Jordan, a Syrian refugee who submitted to an initial security screening in the hopes of moving to the U.S., sees his hopes dashed with President Trump's order.

"When we heard of the order, it was like a bolt of lightning, and all our hopes and dreams vanished," Ammar Sawan said Saturday.

Other Syrian refugees in Jordan warned that U.S. policy could inflame anti-American sentiment in the region.

"This decision made the U.S. lose its reputation in the world as the biggest economy, the biggest democracy," said refugee Nasser Sheik, 44, who was paralyzed by a stroke two years ago and lives with his family in Amman.

"We are not going out to harm people of other countries," added his wife Madaya, 37.

The United Nations hopes that US President Donald Trump's decision to ban refugees is a temporary measure and that they will again be given protection, its spokesman said Saturday.

"We hope that the measures concerning the suspension of refugee flows are temporary as refugee protection needs have never been greater," said UN spokesman Stephane Dujarric.

"The US resettlement program is one of the most important ones in the world."

Trump on Friday signed an executive order suspending the US refugee resettlement program for 120 days.

In addition, all visa applications from seven Muslim countries – Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia and Yemen – were put on hold for at least 90 days.

The UN refugee agency UNHCR and the International Organization for Migration said in a joint statement that they hoped the United States "will continue its strong leadership role and long tradition of protecting those who are fleeing conflict and persecution."

On Friday, UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres told a Holocaust commemoration that discrimination against migrants and refugees along with the stereotyping of Muslims were opening the door to more extreme hatred.

"A 'new normal' of public discourse is taking hold, in which prejudice is given a free pass and the door is opened to even more extreme hatred," Guterres told the General Assembly.

Heartbreak And Anger Follow Trump's Immigration Order

By Evan Allen

Boston Globe, January 28, 2017

Across the state, people working to resettle refugees and immigrants reacted with heartbreak and anger Saturday to President Trump's executive order barring people from seven predominantly Muslim countries from entering the United States.

"This is just really ugly, for us to close our doors like this," said Marc Jacobs, chief executive officer at Jewish Family Service of Metrowest. Jacobs watched more than six months of careful planning — and the desperate hopes of people fleeing war for their lives — evaporate on Friday night when the executive order went into effect.

The order closes the border to immigrants from Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen for 90 days, bars all refugees for 120 days, and bars Syrian refugees indefinitely. The order caused confusion for people who were traveling when it was signed, and protests broke out Saturday in Boston and elsewhere around the country.

For Jacobs, whose organization has built a wide coalition of groups — synagogues, Islamic centers, academic institutions, and health-care providers — to support 15 Syrian refugee families, the impact of the order was immediate and harsh. Five families had made it to America. Ten had not.

The last family had arrived Tuesday night, he said. They stepped off a plane at Logan International Airport, the mother cradling their 1-year-old, the father holding the hand of their 5-year-old. They were just thankful to be safe, he said. When they got to their new apartment to enjoy a welcome meal cooked by another refugee, their 5-year-old took to her new toys with delight, holding a tea party for her teddy bear.

"These are young parents that would do anything for their children," said Jacobs. "It's a child at a time. That's what the horror of this is."

The timing of the executive order — signed on International Holocaust Rememberance Day — lit up social media. One Twitter account spent the day tweeting the entire passenger manifest of the St. Louis — a ship carrying about 900 Jewish refugees to the United States in 1939, which refused it entry.

"Our community knows all too well the suffering that comes from a time America turned away refugees," said Rabbi David Lerner, the rabbi at Temple Emunah in Lexington and president of the Massachusetts Board of Rabbis.

Many synagogues across the state, he said, are taking in and supporting refugees. For Jews and many other religious groups, charity toward refugees and immigrants is a core principle of faith.

"People find this almost a pure opportunity to do what the Gospel says, what our religion teaches — which is the value of serving the poor and rejected, and welcoming strangers and sojourners," said Judson Brown, a member of St. John's Episcopal Church in Northampton, which has made a commitment to sponsor a refugee family of three from the Democratic Republic of Congo.

The family — a mother, father, and 10-month-old baby — was slated to arrive sometime between February and May, he said. Church members and community members have been busy arranging them housing, gathering furniture, and lining up language instruction. Parishioners were even planning to learn a bit of Swahili and Kinyarwanda.

But on Saturday, Brown, like many other people trying to digest the executive order, was not sure how or if it would affect their plans, as the DCR is not one of the seven countries named in the executive order. Even without the order, he said, the process of coming to the United States includes extensive vetting and a thick web of rules and regulations.

"It's not exactly a railroad train," he said.

At St. Peter's Episcopal Church in Weston, where parishioners had raised $2,375 in grants and gift cards toward an interfaith effort organized by Temple Beth Elohim in Wellesley to sponsor two families of Syrian refugees for a year, the Rev. Lynn Campbell said she was crestfallen.

The congregation undertook the effort because it is important to recognize the human dignity of the refugees, she said. The first family, which includes four children under the age of 8, arrived last week. But the second family, due to arrive in the spring, will likely not be resettled after all.

Community organizations that work with immigrants saw their plans thrown into disarray as well.

The International Institute of New England, which resettles about 600 refugee and immigrant families every year, was expecting to receive a family of four from Syria this Monday, said president and CEO Jeffrey Thielman.

Four years after fleeing the war, and after painstakingly following every regulation from the US government, the institute had an apartment and a new life waiting for them in Lowell. But with the order, Thielman said, they have been stranded in Turkey.

"This is a very mean-spirited and unnecessary executive order," said Thielman. "This isn't going to help keep the United States safer. It's not going to make us a stronger country."

Warm Welcome For Syrians In A Country About To Ban Them

By Jodi Kantor

New York Times, January 28, 2017

On Friday afternoon, a group of suburban synagogue members clustered at O'Hare International Airport, waiting to greet one of the last Syrian refugee families to be accepted in the United States, to give them the warmest possible welcome to a country that no longer wanted their kind.

In Washington, the presidential limousine was already speeding toward the Pentagon, where President Trump would sign a paper officially slamming the door shut on Syrian refugees. But here the volunteers had yellow roses, more warm coats than the newcomers would need and, a few miles away, an apartment ready with a doormat that said "welcome" in 17 languages.

"Welcome to chicag Hope you make your selfs at home" said a sign made by one of the youngest members of the group.

Whatever the new president said about the supposed dangers of Syrian refugees, the volunteers, who knew almost nothing about the family they were about to welcome, instantly identified with them anyway. They had already committed to helping guide and care for the newcomers for six months.

Some of the volunteers were children or grandchildren of refugees. Their synagogue, Am Shalom ("Nation of Peace") in Glencoe, Ill., displays a statue depicting members' families who perished at the Nazis' hands. The Syrian family, and the president's orders, were coming on International Holocaust Remembrance Day, some of the volunteers noted with tears in their eyes. A hundred synagogue members had contributed in some way to helping resettle the Syrians: renting an apartment steps from a playground, assembling a vacuum cleaner, lining up juice boxes in the refrigerator.

Some of the synagogue members had signed on instinctually, so the Syrians would be helped the way their own parents or grandparents had been aided when they arrived in the United States. Others had joined as a way of countering Mr. Trump — just a few of the many Americans, of varied backgrounds, reacting with shock, outrage and concern to his curtailment of the country's long-established refugee resettlement system.

"The Statue of Liberty has always been our symbol of welcome," Rabbi Steven Stark Lowenstein, the group's leader, said at the airport. "It feels like Trump turned off the light," he said.

At the Pentagon on Friday, the preparations for the president's actions were orderly: High-level officials gathered in a room called the Hall of Heroes, and photographers assembled. But around the country, refugees, resettlement workers and volunteers expressed panic. Resettlement workers did not know if they would have jobs once Mr. Trump's refugee and immigration plans have been fully carried out. Volunteers wondered what they would do with furniture and money they had collected for refugees who were supposed to arrive soon.

RefugeeOne, the resettlement agency responsible for the family coming into O'Hare, had been expecting another Syrian family to arrive on Monday.

"That's not happening," Kim Snoddy, the program's liaison to groups like the Am Shalom volunteers, said as she waited with them at the airport on Friday.

A volunteer from another Chicago group posted a photograph on Facebook of an empty crib, made up with a pink sheet and a stuffed bunny, for the baby of a family that would no longer arrive.

Resettlement workers and volunteers across the country said that since Election Day, Americans of diverse backgrounds had been lining up to aid refugees, channeling their opposition to Mr. Trump into a desire to help vulnerable newcomers. Sloane Davidson, 37, a graduate student in Pittsburgh, hosted refugees for Thanksgiving dinner and said she was so moved by the experience that she took a job as a case aide at a local agency.

"The more I learned about what I felt to be the truth and the truth that Trump was telling," the more she wanted to get involved, she wrote in an email.

Resettlement agencies said that volunteers had been swarming their offices and that even more had surfaced last week when Mr. Trump's specific plans became public. When the International Refugee Assistance Project put out a call for lawyers to help new arrivals in danger of being turned away, it received 3,000 volunteers in four hours, said Becca Heller, the organization's director.

"People are desperate to help refugees as a way to counter these discriminatory policies," she said.

As the minutes passed at O'Hare, the volunteers checked the time again, tense with the knowledge that Mr. Trump was about to commit pen to paper. The family they were awaiting had flown into Washington the night before, meaning they had cleared immigration with less than a day to spare. But the volunteers said they would not be able to exhale until the newcomers landed in Chicago. The flight was delayed, they heard. They glanced at the time on their phones again.

As soon as the Syrian family of four stepped into the baggage claim area, the synagogue members surrounded them protectively, offering the flowers and signs, as a resettlement worker translated. Because they spoke no English, the newcomers wore tags around their necks, like Paddington Bear, so if they got lost, they could be identified.

In a moment, the two Syrian children's arms were laden with gift bags of toys. The parents said they were too terrified to talk to a reporter, out of concern for family members — some still trapped in dangerous areas of Syria and others who had been cleared to travel to the United States but had not yet received plane tickets.

After hugs and snapshots and many professions of welcome and thanks, the group at the airport dispersed. The refugees headed to their new home with a few escorts, the synagogue members back to their far more stable lives. Just before they parted, Rabbi Lowenstein gathered his congregants and gave them a charge.

"If this is the last group of refugees to get in, we will show them the best of America," he said.

The family was driven to its new home, where a meal and a Syrian-style semolina cake were waiting. Members of the family said they had not checked the news since landing in the United States, and no one from the volunteer group told them what was about to happen. Moments before they arrived at the cozy, fully stocked apartment, Mr. Trump, wearing an American flag pin, signed the orders in front of an audience of his advisers and Pentagon officials. As he finished, the clapping in the room was loud.

Behind him hung an oversize medal depicting the Statue of Liberty, a beacon of welcome.

Donald Trump's Un-American Refugee Policy

By David Miliband

New York Times, January 27, 2017

President Trump's executive order suspending the entire resettlement program for 120 days and banning indefinitely the arrival of Syrian refugees is a repudiation of fundamental American values, an abandonment of the United States' role as a humanitarian leader and, far from protecting the country from extremism, a propaganda gift to those who would plot harm to America.

The order also cuts the number of refugees scheduled for resettlement in the United States in the fiscal year 2017 from a planned total of about 110,000 to just 50,000. Founded on the myth that there is no proper security screening for refugees, the order thus thrusts into limbo an estimated 60,000 vulnerable refugees, most of whom have already been vetted and cleared for resettlement here. The new policy urgently needs rethinking.

Refugees coming to the United States are fleeing the same violent extremism that this country and its allies are fighting in the Middle East and elsewhere. Based on recent data, a majority of those selected for resettlement in America are women and children. Since the start of the war, millions of Syrians have fled not just the military of President Bashar al-Assad but also the forces of Russia, Iranian militias and the Islamic State.

There are also thousands of Afghans and Iraqis whose lives are at risk because of assistance they offered American troops stationed in their countries. Of all the refugees that my organization, the International Rescue Committee, would be helping to resettle this year, this group, the Special Immigrant Visa population, makes up a fourth.

Giving haven for those persecuted for their politics is a core American value. The more than 62,000 Cubans resettled by the committee since 1960 would find this executive order's denial of refugee needs not just insulting, but bizarre.

The order also suggests that the resettlement program should make persecuted religious minorities a higher priority, implying that they have been neglected in the past. This is incorrect; existing law already places strong emphasis on religious persecution among the criteria for resettlement. For example, most of the refugees from Iran — a Muslim-majority country — who are resettled by my organization are not Muslim.

Compared with other types of immigrants, refugees are the most thoroughly vetted group to enter the United States. The resettlement process can take up to 36 months and involves screenings by the Department of Homeland Security, the F.B.I., the Department of Defense, the State Department and the National Counterterrorism Center and United States intelligence community. According to the Cato Institute, the chances that a citizen here will be killed by a refugee are one in 3.64 billion; an American is far more likely to be killed by lightning than by a terrorist attack carried out by a refugee.

The United States can be proud of its wide network of refugee champions, for good reason: Refugee resettlement is an American success story. And this is true not just on the coasts but across the country. In the 29 cities where the Rescue Committee has resettlement offices, elected officials like the mayor of Boise, Idaho, and the governor of Utah, along with police officers, school principals, faith leaders and small-business owners, actively welcome refugees. They do so out of a sense of a moral obligation, of course, but also because they have witnessed the myriad ways refugees have enriched their communities over the years.

To take one example, over the course of a decade, refugees created at least 38 new businesses in the Cleveland area alone. In turn, these businesses created an additional 175 jobs, and in 2012 provided a $12 million stimulus to the local economy.

There is a further concern raised by the president's refugee ban. When the United States abjures its responsibility to the world's most vulnerable people, it forgoes its moral authority to call upon the countries of Europe, as well as poorer nations like Lebanon, Turkey, Kenya and Pakistan, which host over five million refugees among them, to provide such shelter.

Historically, the United States has welcomed the "huddled masses yearning to breathe free," and this has helped cement America's leadership of the international order. But why should others continue to bear their heavy burdens when the United States won't? Support for refugees is not charity; it is a contribution to the global stability on which all nations depend — and this is especially important at a time when the world faces a heightened threat of terrorism.

Terrorists are strategic in their work and their messaging. The civilized world must be equally strategic in its response. Where extremists seek to foster a clash of civilizations, democratic governments should not play into their hands.

That is what a ban on specific nationalities does. It is not right, it is not needed and it is not smart.

In 1980, when Congress passed the Refugee Act with bipartisan support, President Carter's secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Joseph A. Califano Jr., said the refugee issue required the United States to "reveal to the world — and more important to ourselves — whether we truly live by our ideals or simply carve them on our monuments."

That still resonates today. Expert review of the resettlement vetting process is part of good government. Hasty dismissal of carefully developed systems is harmful in and of itself. It is also a distressing departure from fact-based policy making.

The world looks to America for enlightened leadership. Its citizens seek the same from their government. Refugee policy is a telling test for every nation. The United States passed that test for so many years, so it is a tragedy for it now to fail when its commitment is needed more than ever.

Trump Shuts The Door On Men And Women Who Have Sacrificed For America

By Matt Zeller

Matt Zeller is a veteran of the war in Afghanistan and the co-founder and chief executive of No One Left Behind

With his latest executive order and immigration ban, President Trump has shut the door on thousands of foreign interpreters, our wartime allies, who have served alongside our military since 2001. As a combat veteran who has served in the U.S. Army, this action deeply disappoints and angers me. I shouldn't be alive today. I am only here writing this piece because of my Afghan Muslim translator, Janis. He shot and killed two Taliban fighters who nearly ambushed me in a firefight in Afghanistan in 2008.

The president's actions on Friday are troubling for so many reasons. First, the sweeping ban doesn't take into account that our allied military translators are quite possibly the most vetted individuals aligned with our military. The stringent background checks begin long before they are cleared to work alongside Americans in a combat zone. Then the process for granting the Special Immigrant Visa (SIV), which allows them to resettle in the United States, is even more painstaking. To even apply for the SIV, one must meet ALL of the following criteria:

Be a national of Iraq or Afghanistan; and

Have worked directly with U.S. armed forces or under Chief of Missions authority as an interpreter for at least 12 months; and

Have obtained a favorable, written recommendation from a military or civilian member of the U.S. government.

All this to simply apply for the SIV. To be approved, the interpreter must clear these additional hurdles:

• Receive the written nomination;

• Prove he or she provided at least 12 to 24 months of honorable and valuable service to the United States war effort;

• Prove he or she is under immediate duress due to that service;

• And, lastly, pass the most extreme form of vetting the United States can muster — a comprehensive national security background investigation completed by every single component of the U.S. national security apparatus (the CIA, FBI, National Security Agency, etc.). All agencies conduct separate investigations and do not coordinate cross-agency. The decision from the national security apparatus must be unanimous, meaning that all the agencies involved must approve the application package. If even one agency dissents on a visa approval, that applicant is barred from entry to the United States and placed on the no-fly list — forever.

These men and women have served our country honorably — in some cases, for more than a decade. A decade of combat service to America, fighting alongside Americans, wearing the same uniforms, bleeding their blood for our country. Is that not the most American thing one could do — fight for the ideals they believe in to better one's country? These wartime allies are true-blooded Americans, though they were born half a world away.

Would we deny a man who was injured in multiple improvised explosive device (IED) attacks, repeatedly led U.S. service members through enemy territory safely and fostered local relations? Would we deny a man who is credited with saving five American soldiers lives, including mine? Remember, this man's name is Janis, and if he were an American-born veteran, we'd pin medals to his chest and call him a hero.

This ban leaves thousands of our wartime allies to fend for themselves against the very enemies we asked them to fight. Veterans of the Vietnam War speak often of their half-century injury at having abandoned so many of our Vietnamese allies. Friday, the president cast the same injury upon our newest generation of American veterans and we didn't get a say. Many of our wartime allies have already been waiting on their visas for years and some, with approved visa in hand, will simply not be able to make it to safety because of the president's decision.

We are permanently harming the fabric of U.S. national security. Our credibility is forever tarnished if not eroded. Why would any potential ally trust the United States to keep its word again? It pains me to think how many U.S. service-members will die in future conflicts because we were unable to recruit the local, on-the-ground support that is often the difference between life and death. These men and women have sacrificed so much for the United States. Friday's order means the enemy wins, and we have turned our backs on our own ideals.

I Went Through America's Extreme Vetting

By Mostafa Hassoun

Politico Magazine, January 28, 2017

I'm a Syrian refugee living in the United States. My family, which fled to Turkey in 2011 as protests against the government grew, is Muslim. And on Friday, Donald Trump signed an executive order that would have made it difficult, if not impossible for me to find safety in America.

This executive order, which suspends visas for the citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries and calls for "extreme vetting," isn't just discriminatory and heartless – it doesn't make any sense. Because in every conceivable way, the vetting process is already extremely thorough. I know this because I went through the process myself.

Over 15 months I was interviewed five times – in person, over the phone, by the United Nations and by the United States. They asked me about my family, my politics, my hobbies, my childhood, my opinions of the U.S., and even my love life. No less than four U.S. government agencies had the opportunity to screen me. By the time I received my offer to live in the United States, the U.S. officials in charge of my case file knew me better than my family and friends do.

In fact, there is probably nobody in the world that knows me better than the United States government. But that didn't stop Trump from saying last December, "People are pouring in from regions of the Middle East. We have no idea who they are, where they come from."

President Trump knows both who I am and where I'm from, and a whole lot more. If there is something else he'd like to know – anything short of my family renouncing its Syrian and Muslim identities – I can't imagine what it might be.

Until the start of the civil war, I had never left Syria. But in 2011, my parents, my three sisters, my brother and I fled our coastal hometown of Latakia. We really didn't have a choice – the regime knew that my father and I had participated in the protests, and government forces were on their way to occupy our city. If we stayed, we would have been killed.

When we arrived at the Turkish border, we camped there for two weeks, waiting for an international solution that would stop the fighting. None came, but with regime forces approaching, we asked the Turkish army for permission to cross the border. They took down our information, gave us refugee identification numbers, and brought us to camps.

By the time my family and I applied for resettlement in 2013, my family was living in Antakya, a city in southern Turkey. As a group, we walked into a refugee center run by the United Nations, gave them our basic information and formally applied. We got a call a week later, asking us to come for an interview in Ankara, Turkey's capital, and two weeks after that we got on buses to take the nine-hour trip.

Riding on the bus that day, I had no idea that I was about to begin the longest application process of my life.

When we first arrived, the United Nations officials measured our height, our weight, took our fingerprints and our photos. Once every member of the family had been accounted for, they ushered us into our first interview. They asked what our religion was, what our politics were, where we went to school, what we were doing 10 years ago. I'm not religious, but my father answered for the family and said that we're Muslim. After an hour, they split us up and interviewed individually. Then the questions got even more specific: "Why do you hate Syria's president, Bashar al-Assad?" "Why were you protesting?" "What's your opinion of Barack Obama?" They asked about my friends, my relatives, who they are, where they are and what they do. When I told them that several of my friends had died in the uprising, they pressed for details. The interviewers checked for discrepancies in my story as they repeated to me the questions they had already asked my father. This went on for another two hours.

By the time our family headed home, we had divulged the majority of our life stories. But as it turns out, this was just an introductory interview. Two months later we were back on the bus, heading to Gaziantep, Turkey, for the next round. They asked us all of the same questions as before, but this time with follow-up questions and an aggressive attention to detail. “If Assad gives you freedom and democracy, why are you protesting him? What is it exactly that you want from him?” “Who were you protesting with? Were you involved with any groups?” My interviewer wanted to know all of my associations and connections, from before and during the revolution.

And this time, it was clear that the interviewer had done her research beforehand. She would follow up my answers with a pointed, “Are you sure?”, and she would ask questions that clearly had a right and a wrong answer. At one point, she asked me how long my family had camped on the border Turkish-Syrian border. I told her two weeks. She looked at me and inquired, “Two weeks, or more like 20 days?” I said yes, 20 days sounded about right.

Between the in-person interviews, I know that the officials handling my application were looking for anything, anything at all, that could disqualify me for resettlement. And when they thought they found something, they wouldn’t hesitate to follow up. A month after my second interview, I received a phone call out of the blue. The resettlement agency asked me about a field hospital I worked in for seven months, after we first arrived in Turkey. Did I know who owned it? Does he work with a jihadist group? Whose donations are funding this hospital? I told them I knew little – I was just working there, helping out. Their probing continued for half an hour.

By this point, my family had an online file. We could check the status of our application online, and we did check every day.

A few weeks after I received the phone call, our status was updated: The International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) had accepted our application for settlement in the United States. This did not mean the United States was accepting us as refugees; it just meant that the ICMC, which is a federally funded Resettlement Support Center, had accepted our application for consideration. There was no guarantee our application would succeed, and the American vetting process was just beginning.

Next we were on our way to Istanbul, a 15-hour bus ride from Antakya. The ICMC center we walked into felt like an embassy; beyond multiple security checkpoints was a flurry of activity, and the reception area was full of refugees from Syria, Iraq and elsewhere, waiting for their chance at a new life.

As had happened during our first interview, the employees took our fingerprints and a variety of profile photos. This time, they even scanned our irises.

The interview went much the same way as before, repeating many of the same questions we had already heard. This time, there were more questions about the United States. If I lived in America, what would I want to do there? They wanted to know if I’d be interested in protesting in the United States, and what would I protest for? What are some good things and bad things about the United States? They even asked if I had a girlfriend, and if I did, would I want to bring her with me? During the entire two hours, cameras in the room were rolling.

My family grew accustomed to waiting – who knew when we would receive the next phone call? Maybe if we were rejected, we never would be told? I now know that as the months rolled by, I was being screened by any number of U.S. agencies, such as the State Department, the FBI and the National Counterterrorism Center, to name a few. For cases of Syrian refugees specifically, the Department of Homeland Security conducts an enhanced review.

Finally the phone call came in and we headed back to Istanbul, this time for an interview with the State Department. We were made to swear that everything we had said in past interviews was true, and told that if we made it to the United States and the government later discovered we had been lying about something in our past, we would be in major trouble. The U.S. officials mostly asked questions we’ve been asked before – biographical history, political affiliations, our reasons for protesting Assad. The officers asking the questions had been specially trained for this moment, the final interview in what had become a 15-month process. In many ways, I’m lucky – the average wait for a refugee applicant is 18 to 24 months. Or, at least it was.

With the final interview completed, and a few more months of waiting after that, I only had one barrier left: the medical check. This wasn’t a check-your-temperature, hit-your-knee-with-a-hammer kind of doctor’s appointment; this was a top-to-bottom, full-scale health assessment. They took blood samples, X-rayed most of my body and stripped me of my clothing. My eyes, and then my ears, were tested as healthy. All told, the medical examination was an eight-hour day.

Finally, after nearly a year and a half of being poked and prodded, physically and figuratively, I had been given clearance to start a new life in the United States. The U.S. government by then had a complete picture of who I am and who I’ve been. Getting through the five interviews was truly an exercise of autobiography, and if you told me beforehand the depth and breadth of United States’ vetting process, I probably wouldn’t have believed you. It was definitely extreme.

But not everyone in my family was given the same offer to move to the U.S. Only my sister and I were granted the opportunity, and my sister decided she didn’t want to part with her parents and other siblings. As for my mom and the others, after the final interview, they never heard back from the American resettlement agency. Luckily, they eventually received offers from other countries; my mom, my brother and one of my sisters are in Sweden, I have another sister in Germany, and my father is still in Turkey but hopes to join my mom in Sweden soon.

It's almost beyond belief to me that anyone could mischaracterize the U.S. government's vetting process as weak and insufficient, when it's clearly anything but, to justify shutting the gate to millions of Syrian refugees. There is no way to look at my experience and the experience of tens of thousands of other refugees living in America and conclude that the country's vetting system is not exhaustive and thorough.

To me, the real rationale behind Friday's executive order is obvious: The president and his supporters do not trust people like me. Being both Syrian and Muslim (though I'm not personally religious) makes me doubly suspicious. I'm happy to be in the United States, a country I love. But it saddens me deeply to see what is happening here.

Tech Firms Recall Employees To U.S., Denounce Trump's Ban On Refugees From Muslim Countries

By Brian Fung And Tracy Jan

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

The country's leading tech companies are recalling overseas employees and sharply criticizing President Trump in the wake of his order on Friday that barred foreign Muslims from entering the United States for 120 days.

Google chief executive Sundar Pichai late on Friday ordered scores of staffers traveling overseas to return to the United States immediately. Pichai sent out a company-wide memo that was highly critical of Trump's action, saying it could prevent roughly 190 foreign-born Google employees from entering the United States, according to a person who has seen the memo and verified its authenticity.

"We're upset about the impact of this order and any proposals that could impose restrictions on Googlers and their families," wrote Pichai, "or that could create barriers to bringing great talent to the US."

Thousands of tech workers living in Silicon Valley or abroad could potentially be impacted by Trump's executive order, according to Zahra Billoo, executive director of the San Francisco Bay Area office of Council on American-Islamic Relations.

About 250,000 Muslims are estimated to live in the Bay Area, many of whom are Arab or South Asian immigrants working at companies such as Google, Facebook, Twitter and Microsoft. Green card holders are at risk as well.

"This is just where it starts. What happens when they add Pakistan? Or a Gulf country? Indonesia and Malaysia?" said Billoo, a civil rights attorney. "By targeting immigrants in this way, Trump's executive orders not only directly impacts certain workers, their families and these companies, they also impact co-workers because people from other Muslim-majority countries could be next."

In addition to blocking travelers from Iraq, Iran, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Libya and Yemen, the restrictions on foreign entry will also apply to those who hold dual nationality. That would mean a person born in one of those seven countries, but holding a passport from some other country such as the U.K., could also be denied entry into the United States.

Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith, in a letter to staff Saturday, said that at least 76 employees will be affected by Trump's policy. The company said it has already contacted those individuals with offers of legal assistance, and urged other employees who may be subject to the ban to contact the company as soon as possible.

"As an immigrant and as a CEO, I've both experienced and seen the positive impact that immigration has on our company, for the country, and for the world," wrote Satya Nadella, Microsoft's chief executive, in a LinkedIn post. "We will continue to advocate on this important topic."

Facebook chief executive Mark Zuckerberg on Friday wrote in a public message that both he and his wife, Priscilla Chan, are indebted to the United States' policy of welcomeness and inclusion.

"We should also keep our doors open to refugees and those who need help. That's who we are," wrote Zuckerberg. "Had we turned away refugees a few decades ago, Priscilla's family wouldn't be here today."

Similar sentiments were expressed across the tech industry. Apple chief executive Tim Cook, who was in Washington to meet with Republican officials, tweeted a historic quote from President Lincoln highlighting "malice toward none" and "charity for all" during a visit to Ford's Theatre.

Meanwhile, a major trade group representing firms such as Amazon, Netflix, Microsoft and LinkedIn said Saturday that Trump's decision had "troubling consequences" for Silicon Valley companies who depend on talent from overseas.

"The internet industry is deeply concerned with the implications of President Trump's executive order limiting immigration and movement into the United States," said Michael Beckerman, president of the Internet Association.

Trump's hostility toward Muslim refugees and immigrants raises tensions between the White House and Silicon Valley. Aside from PayPal co-founder Peter Thiel, who has been closely advising Trump, much of the tech industry had supported Hillary Clinton for president. In open letters and other public statements during the campaign, tech execs and workers objected to Trump's anti-Muslim views, and some signed onto a commitment not to help design Trump's proposed Muslim registry.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Trump's action against Middle Eastern travelers obligates tech companies to take a stand, said Sam Altman, president of the influential startup accelerator Y Combinator, in a blog post Saturday.

"The precedent of invalidating already-issued visas and green cards should be extremely troubling for immigrants of any country or for anyone who thinks their contributions to the US are important," said Altman in a blog post. "This is not just a Muslim ban. This is a breach of America's contract with all the immigrants in the nation."

For many in Silicon Valley, Trump's order crossed "a red line," according to Hunter Walk, a partner at the San Francisco-based venture capital firm Homebrew VC.

"For those of us who've already been vocal ... [it's] moving people from saying 'focus on midterm elections' to apply direct pressure to our industry's CEOs and our politicians to take a stand," said Walk. "And for those in our industry who thought they could just wait and see, they're taking our administration both literally and seriously this morning."

Trump Immigration Ban Sends Shockwaves Through Tech

By Jessica Guynn And Laura Mandaro

USA Today, January 28, 2017

SAN FRANCISCO — President Trump's order banning immigrants from seven predominantly Muslim countries from entering the U.S. began hitting the tech industry Saturday, with Google's CEO leading a growing list of tech executives condemning the ban.

The CEOs of Microsoft, Apple, Netflix and Uber denounced with the policy, which would affect their own employees working here legally, as well as their competitive quest for talent.

"Trump's actions are hurting Netflix employees around the world, and are so un-American it pains us all," Netflix CEO and founder Reed Hastings said in a Facebook post. "It is time to link arms together to protect American values of freedom and opportunity."

In a staff memo, Google CEO Sundar Pichai said the move affects at least 187 of the Internet giant's staff.

"We're concerned about the impact of this order and any proposals that could impose restrictions on Googlers and their families, or that could create barriers to bringing great talent to the U.S.," Google said in a statement. "We'll continue to make our views on these issues known to leaders in Washington and elsewhere."

The president's executive order suspends the entry of all refugees to the United States for 120 days, halts the admission of refugees from Syria indefinitely and bars entry for three months to residents from the predominantly Muslim countries of Iraq, Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia and Yemen.

The order made good on one of Trump's most controversial campaign promises, a series of Muslim-focused restrictions he says should prevent terrorists from entering U.S. soil. For many of his supporters, preventing or delaying legal immigrants from returning to high-paid tech jobs, which they say should go to U.S.-born workers anyway, is a small price to pay for the promise of more security.

The move is already roiling the tech industry, with affected employees being urged to return to the U.S. and consult with corporate immigration experts.

Internet Association President and CEO Michael Beckerman said the Internet industry is "deeply concerned" by Trump's order.

"While this order impacts many companies outside of the tech industry, Internet companies in particular thrive in the U.S. because the best and the brightest are able to create innovative products and services right here in America," Beckerman said in an emailed statement. "While we support President Trump's efforts to grow our economy and allow 'people of great talent' to come into the U.S., the executive order signed yesterday has troubling consequences."

The ban includes green card holders who are authorized to live and work in the United States, according to a Homeland Security spokeswoman, Reuters reported. Some immigrants with legal visas trying to return to the U.S. from trips abroad were also detained, according to news reports.

"The blanket entry ban on citizens from certain primarily Muslim countries is not the best way to address the country's challenges," Elon Musk, CEO of Tesla and SpaceX and an adviser to President Trump said on Twitter. "Many people negatively affected by this policy are strong supporters of the U.S. They've done right,not wrong & don't deserve to be rejected."

In a memo sent to Google employees first reported by Bloomberg News and the Wall Street Journal, Pichai said one employee was rushing back from a trip to New Zealand before the order was assigned, while two others were grappling with what this might mean to their families.

A similar situation was playing out at other tech companies.

Microsoft said it’s providing legal advice and assistance to its employees affected by the executive order.

“We share the concerns about the impact of the executive order on our employees from the listed countries, all of whom have been in the United States lawfully,” the tech giant said in a statement.

According to Microsoft’s general counsel Brad Smith, 76 Microsoft employees are citizens with a U.S. visa from the affected countries.

“We’ve already contacted everyone in this group,” he told employees in a memo. “But there may be other employees from these countries who have U.S. green cards rather than a visa who may be affected, and there may be family members from these countries that we haven’t yet reached.”

Microsoft CEO Satya Nadella said in a LinkedIn post that his company would “continue to advocate on this important topic.”

“As an immigrant and as a CEO, I’ve both experienced and seen the positive impact that immigration has on our company, for the country, and for the world,” Nadella said.

Uber CEO Travis Kalanick told employees he would raise the immigration ban on Friday when he takes part in President Trump’s first business advisory group meeting.

“While every government has their own immigration controls, allowing people from all around the world to come here and make America their home has largely been the U.S.’s policy since its founding. That means this ban will impact many innocent people,” Kalanick said.

Apple CEO Tim Cook is in Washington, D.C., where he has been meeting with GOP lawmakers and with Trump’s daughter Ivanka and her husband, Jared Kushner.

In a memo to employees, he said “it is not a policy we support.”

“In my conversations with officials here in Washington this week, I’ve made it clear that Apple believes deeply in the importance of immigration — both to our company and to our nation’s future. Apple would not exist without immigration, let alone thrive and innovate the way we do,” Cook wrote, according to a memo sent to employees worldwide and obtained by USA TODAY. Apple co-founder Steve Jobs was the son of a Syrian immigrant.

For Box CEO Aaron Levie, the Trump order also hit home. One of the founders of the cloud-based storage and services company is Iranian-American and Box is currently trying to assess how many of its employees are affected.

“At the corporate level, we are trying to take inventory on who could be impacted and ensuring that they stay within the country for now,” Levie said. “We are really just getting a handle on the legal side of the situation, what we can fight and ultimately how we protect employees in the process.”

More broadly, the order sends “the wrong moral message to the world and within our own country,” Levie said, turning away refugees and doing nothing to make Americans safer. “It’s very unfortunate and very disappointing,” he said.

Slack CEO Stewart Butterfield also condemned the immigration ban.

“Immigration is unambiguously an economic benefit, but, doesn’t matter: do the right thing because it’s right,” he wrote in a series of posts on Twitter. “My grandfather came from Poland between the wars, at 17, sponsored by an elder sister. Two more siblings made it. Everyone else died.”

Technology investor Chris Sacca pledged to match donations to the American Civil Liberties Union up to $25,000 and then quickly raised it to $50,000. The American Civil Liberties Union and the Council on American-Islamic Relations, or CAIR, say they have either filed lawsuits or will do so shortly challenging the ban.

With protests spreading to airports on Saturday, Sam Altman, president of Silicon Valley tech incubator Y Combinator, urged the tech industry to speak up.

“It is time for tech companies to start speaking up about some of the actions taken by President Trump’s administration,” Altman said in a blog post. “The tech community is powerful. Large tech companies in particular have enormous power and are held in high regard. We need to hear from the CEOs clearly and unequivocally. Although there is some business risk in doing so, there is strength in numbers—if everyone does it early this coming week, we will all make each other stronger.”

Immigrants account for a significant part of the workforce in the tech industry, which has for years advocated loosening laws to increase the flow of skilled immigrants into the U.S. With its heavy reliance on the H-1B visa program that allows software engineers and other skilled workers to work in the U.S., Silicon Valley fears what immigration restrictions will come from the Trump administration.

Trump’s perspective on immigrants, and Muslims in particular, has caused tensions between the White House and Silicon Valley. Tech executives and workers have denounced the president’s anti-Muslim views and some have pledged not to help build Trump’s proposed Muslim registry.

On Saturday, Airbnb CEO Brian Chesky pushed back against Trump’s executive order in a tweet. “Open doors brings all of U.S. together. Closing doors further divides U.S.,” he wrote. “Let’s all find ways to connect people, not separate them.”

Some in Silicon Valley have direct ties to the Trump administration. Peter Thiel, a Trump transition team member, sits on the board of Facebook and he’s a part-time partner at Y Combinator. He’s an investor in many companies including Airbnb.

A Facebook employee of Middle Eastern descent told BuzzFeed News that some Facebook employees want the company to “clarify” its relationship with Thiel.

“There are questions here that we want answered. Does Thiel support this ban?” the person said. “Does he think the Facebook employees who come from Iran and those other countries shouldn’t be allowed to keep working here? We deserve to know his position on this.”

Uber’s Kalanick said his policy is to engage with Trump.

“We partner around the world optimistically in the belief that by speaking up and engaging we can make a difference. Our experience is that not doing so shortchanges cities and the people who live in them. This is why I agreed in early December to join President Trump’s economic advisory group,” he told employees. “I understand that many people internally and externally may not agree with that decision, and that’s OK. It’s the magic of living in America that people are free to disagree.”

The growing number of public statements from technology leaders was unusual, a measure of the perceived threat to their businesses and to their own political beliefs.

“As a tech leader and public CEO, I’m often advised to stay apolitical,” Twilio CEO Jeff Lawson wrote in a Medium post. “But this isn’t politics, I believe this is a matter of objective right and wrong. Staying silent doesn’t feel like leadership to me. I encourage other leaders to consider the cost of silence.”

Google’s Pichai was the second executive of a major tech company to speak out against Trump’s immigration order. Earlier Friday, Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg said he was concerned about the immigration order’s reach.

“Expanding the focus of law enforcement beyond people who are real threats would make all Americans less safe by diverting resources, while millions of undocumented folks who don’t pose a threat will live in fear of deportation,” he wrote on his Facebook page.

In a statement on Saturday, Facebook said: “We are assessing the impact on our workforce and determining how best to protect our people and their families from any adverse effects.”

Trump’s stance on immigration was one of the key reasons the tech industry widely opposed Trump’s candidacy. Many of tech’s most successful companies have been founded or are run by immigrants, and the industry employs thousands of immigrants, often from Asian countries.

After Trump’s win, tech executives from Google, Facebook, Amazon and others met with the president-elect in a summit seen as a pragmatic move to find some common ground with the new administration. Tech leaders were largely silent as Trump has rapidly signed orders in his first week in office.

That changed later in the week. Facebook COO and and Lean In author Sheryl Sandberg also broke her silence, taking to Facebook to criticize the order that would bar funding to overseas healthcare providers that give abortion counseling.

Google, Facebook Reflect Tech Dismay On Trump Immigration Order

By Mark Bergen And Eric Newcomer

Bloomberg News, January 28, 2017

Alphabet Inc.’s Google asked staffers who may be affected by a new executive order on immigration to return to the U.S. quickly, joining a growing number of technology executives voicing concerns over restrictions that could interfere with how they do business.

Google Chief Executive Officer Sundar Pichai slammed President Donald Trump’s move in a note to employees Friday, telling them that more than 100 company staff are affected by the order. Microsoft Corp. said it’s in touch with 76 staffers from the seven countries identified in the executive order.

“It’s painful to see the personal cost of this executive order on our colleagues,” Pichai wrote in the memo, a copy of which was obtained by Bloomberg News. “We’ve always made our view on immigration issues known publicly and will continue to do so.”

The comments underscore a growing rift between the Trump administration and several large U.S. technology companies, which include many immigrants in their ranks and have lobbied for fewer immigration restrictions. Facebook Inc. CEO Mark Zuckerberg voiced concern over the policy on Friday, and Airbnb Inc. CEO Brian Chesky said Saturday in a tweet that “closing doors further divides” people.

Uber Technologies Inc. CEO Travis Kalanick said Saturday that he plans to outline his misgivings about the order at the first meeting of the Trump administration’s business advisory group next Friday in Washington.Stranded Drivers

Uber has about a dozen staffers affected by the order, as well as a number of drivers, Kalanik said in an e-mailed statement.

“This order has far broader implications as it also affects thousands of drivers who use Uber and come from the listed countries, many of whom take long breaks to go back home to see their extended family. These drivers currently outside of the U.S. will not be able to get back into the country for 90 days," he said. He said his company was working out a plan to compensate those drivers stranded abroad.

Trump signed the executive order on Friday prohibiting entry by people from seven majority-Muslim nations for 90 days. Citizens of Iran, Iraq, Libya, Sudan, Somalia, Syria and Yemen would be banned from entering the U.S. for the period, while the government determines what information it needs to safely admit visitors.

Some visa and green-card holders were blocked from boarding flights to the U.S. after the order was issued and several people were being detained at U.S. airports when they arrived, the New York Times reported. The Department of Homeland Security issued a directive on Friday afternoon ordering the Customs and Border Control agency to enforce the order immediately.Barriers for Talent

"We're concerned about the impact of this order and any proposals that could impose restrictions on Googlers and their families, or that create barriers to bringing great talent to the U.S.," a Google spokeswoman said in a statement. "We'll continue to make our views on these issues known to leaders in Washington and elsewhere."

Some Google employees were traveling abroad and were trying to get back to the U.S. before the order took effect. The company asked them to reach out to Google's security, travel, and immigration teams for assistance, according to a person familiar with the situation. The person asked not to be identified talking about internal company communications.

Google declined to say Saturday whether any employees were detained or blocked from boarding flights.Rushing Home

The employees in question normally work in the U.S. but just happened to be abroad either on work assignments or vacations. One employee rushed back from a trip to New Zealand to make it into the U.S. before the order was signed, Google's Pichai wrote in his memo.

"We are advising our clients from those seven countries who have green cards or any type of H-1B visa not to travel outside the U.S.," said Ava Benach, a partner at immigration law firm Benach Collopy LLP, while noting that the order takes effect immediately.

"No one is really sure whether a green card holder from these seven countries can return to the U.S. now. It's fairly clear that an H-1B visa holder can't," Benach said. The H-1B lets U.S. companies employ graduate-level workers from other countries in technical occupations such as technology, engineering and science.

"If anyone in these situations has the misfortune to have gone abroad recently, it's a treacherous moment, possibly for green card holders too," Benach said.

Other technology companies are likely in a similar situation, she added.Microsoft Memo

Microsoft Chief Legal Officer Brad Smith said Saturday in a memo to staff that the company is working with affected personnel and that it supports immigration policies that "protect the public without sacrificing people's freedom of expression or religion."

Microsoft also affirms "the importance of protecting legitimate and law-abiding refugees whose very lives may be at stake in immigration proceedings," Smith wrote.

The company included language in a securities filing on Thursday on the issue, cautioning investors that immigration restrictions "may inhibit our ability to adequately staff our research and development efforts."

Facebook's Zuckerberg said Friday that he was "concerned" by Trump's recent moves to restrict immigration.

Tech Industry Reacts To Trump's Executive Order On Immigration With Fear And Frustration

By Tracey Lien, Contact Reporter

Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2017

The morning after Donald Trump won the presidential election, Silicon Valley entrepreneur Amr Shady called his immigration lawyer in a panic.

"My 10-year-old daughter asked me, 'Does this mean we're going to get kicked out?'" said the 40-year-old founder of analytics start-up Reveel, who emigrated from Egypt to the Bay Area in 2015. "I had to find out what Trump winning meant for my immigration status, but also what it meant for my chief data scientist."

His lawyer, Los Angeles immigration attorney Ayda Akalin, was inundated with calls from similarly nervous clients who were either already living and working in the U.S. on visas, or had visa applications pending.

At the time, Akalin assured them that nothing had yet changed, and it was too soon to be worried. But after Trump signed an executive order Friday banning citizens of Syria, Iraq, Iran, Sudan, Somalia, Yemen and Libya from entering the U.S. for 90 days, Akalin had an update for her clients, particularly those from Muslim-majority countries: Stay inside the United States.

"All of my Muslim clients are scared, even those from other countries," said Akalin, who herself is Iranian American, having immigrated to the U.S. when she was 5 years old.

The move blindsided the technology industry, which thought that its main battle on the immigration front was over the number of H-1B visas — granted to high-skilled foreign workers — that will be made available each year. The tech sector relies heavily on foreign-born software engineers to meet its staffing needs, and it has long lobbied for the government to lift the cap on the H-1B visa program to allow more foreign workers temporary employment with U.S. firms.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But H-1Bs took a backseat on Friday as tech workers and entrepreneurs already legally living and working in the U.S. worried about their own futures. Many were caught off guard by the order's reach, which extends to lawful permanent residents — or green card holders — too.

"For those abroad, we are telling them to come back as soon as possible, and be prepared to face questioning and possible refusal," Akalin said.

The order also compelled several big tech companies to break their silence about the Trump administration. Google Chief Executive Sundar Pichai slammed the order in a memo to employees.

"It's painful to see the personal cost of this executive order on our colleagues," Pichai wrote, according to Bloomberg News. "We've always made our view on immigration issues known publicly and will continue to do so."

Bloomberg reports that the memo urged employees traveling overseas who are affected by the order to seek help from the company's security and immigration teams. More than 100 employees are affected, Pichai said.

"We're concerned about the impact of this order and any proposals that could impose restrictions on Googlers and their families, or that could create barriers to bringing great talent to the U.S.," a Google spokesperson said. "We'll continue to make our views on these issues known to leaders in Washington and elsewhere."

Mark Zuckerberg, Facebook's chief executive, also spoke out against Trump's action, although in a less direct way, taking to his personal Facebook page to remind his millions of followers that his wife, pediatrician and philanthropist Priscilla Chan, is the daughter of refugees.

"My great grandparents came from Germany, Austria and Poland. Priscilla's parents were refugees from China and Vietnam," Zuckerberg wrote. "The United States is a nation of immigrants, and we should be proud of that."

The chief executives of Netflix, Microsoft and Lyft similarly issued statements or internal memos opposing the president's directive.

Even tech executives close to the Trump administration criticized the order.

Uber CEO Travis Kalanick — who serves on a panel advising Trump on business issues — said many drivers for the ride-hailing service are immigrants from the affected countries who often visit extended families abroad and might have trouble reentering the U.S. The company is considering compensating those drivers "over the next three months to mitigate some of the financial stress and complications with supporting their families and putting food on the table." Kalanick said he would raise issue when the panel convenes for its first meeting Friday in Washington.

Tesla Motors and SpaceX CEO Elon Musk — who met with Trump at the White House last week — said on Twitter a "blanket entry ban on citizens from certain primarily Muslim countries is not the best way to address the country's challenges."

"Many people negatively affected by this policy are strong supporters of the US," wrote Musk, who also serves on the panel. "They've done right, not wrong & don't deserve to be rejected."

The tech industry has in the past highlighted the value of immigrants to American culture and the economy: Steve Jobs was of Syrian descent, high-profile executives at Twitter, Yahoo, Google and eBay are of Iranian descent. Along with most of the world's biggest technology companies, the Bay Area is home to some 250,000 Muslims, according to a study by the Institute for Social Policy and Understanding, of which 60% are foreign-born.

Venture capital firms see Trump's move as a slap in the face, especially since it comes less than two weeks after the Department of Homeland Security passed a rule allowing eligible foreign entrepreneurs to work in the U.S. for up to five years. The rule change — which Silicon Valley saw as a boon, and is expected to take effect July 17 — was proposed by President Obama last summer.

"We felt that, finally, things were moving forward," said Zafer Younis, a partner at venture capital firm 500 Startups, which prides itself on its international investments, many of which are in countries that are predominantly Muslim. "This new development really dampened it."

The executive order increases the uncertainty and risk of investing internationally, Younis said. And while 500 Startups will continue investing abroad, there's concern that other venture capital firms that were once eyeing international opportunities will now get cold feet.

"It changes the risk profile all of a sudden," he said.

But for Younis, it's personal, too. Originally from Jordan, Younis has lived in the Bay Area for the past two years on an EB-1 visa — a green card that is granted to those deemed to have "extraordinary ability." Though Jordan is not on Trump's list of countries whose citizens are banned from entering the U.S., it is a Muslim-majority nation, and it has given him pause.

"My wife is here. I have upcoming business trips to Japan and Europe. I'm not affected, yet I have to think twice — do I really need to travel or not?" he said. "It's a feeling I thought I left back in the Middle East. It's an anxiety, that things are beyond your control."

That anxiety is shared by other technologists and entrepreneurs in the Bay Area. Shady, the Egyptian entrepreneur, is also in the U.S. on an EB-1 visa. He and his children have Canadian citizenship, but his wife is an Egyptian citizen.

"So what does that mean?" he said. "If Egypt is on the list three months from now, what does that mean for our family?"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The American Civil Liberties Union on Saturday filed a lawsuit against the Trump administration on behalf of two men who were detained at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport while traveling back to the U.S. after Trump's immigration crackdown. Silicon Valley venture capitalist Chris Sacca tweeted that he would match donations to the ACLU up to $25,000.

Tech CEOs are slowly raising their voices. Immigration lawyers are advising their clients to stay put. And in a Silicon Valley mosque where Shady attended Friday prayers, the sheikh preached that everyone needs to stand against injustice toward all communities, even if their own is not directly affected.

"This is the most important thing for me right now because, even though it doesn't affect me directly, it's important for us to all understand what it means to stand against unfairness and the splitting of families," Shady said.

Airlines Rushing To Comply With Trump's Surprise Travel Ban

By Michael Sasso And Christopher Palmeri

Bloomberg News, January 28, 2017

Global airlines are struggling to comply with new travel restrictions after being caught flat-footed by President Donald Trump's executive order blocking visitors from seven predominantly Muslim nations.

U.S. carriers didn't get advance notice of the travel ban or briefings from government officials on how it should be implemented, people familiar with the matter said.

The order was causing chaos at airports in the U.S. and abroad as border agents blocked travelers from entering the country and airlines barred visa-holders from Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen, as well as people from those countries who are lawful U.S. residents, from getting on planes to the country.

"We are aware of the directive and are working with the federal government to comply," United Continental Holdings Inc. spokesman Luke Punzenberger said in a statement.

The president's order has the potential to impose costs on the airlines, which are struggling to understand its terms, said Robert Mann, president of aviation consultancy R.W. Mann & Co. Carriers are responsible for returning passengers to where their travel began if they were brought to the U.S. improperly, he said.

"It's very confusing for airlines," he said in an interview. "They literally don't have a reference point now on how they can accommodate their customers."

Airlines follow a detailed set of government regulations specifying who is allowed into the U.S. Based on news reports, Mann said it appears that Trump issued his order without giving carriers a chance to change their existing rule books.Airline Reaction

Airlines worldwide reacted to Trump's order on Saturday:

Delta Air Lines Inc. said it would contact customers affected by the ban about rebooking options including refunds, according to a statement by the carrier detailing the new travel restrictions.

Emirates, the world's biggest long-haul carrier, is providing similar assistance. "A very small number of our passengers traveling were affected by the new U.S. immigration entry requirements implemented by the U.S. Customs and Border Protection today," the Dubai-based company said in a prepared statement.

British Airways is offering affected customers "a refund for their travel to the U.S." and will give passengers the option of rebooking flights. WestJet Airlines Ltd., Canada's second-largest carrier, is providing full refunds to customers barred from the U.S. Air Canada is waiving change fees and allowing refunds.

American Airlines Group Inc. and industry trade group Airlines for America declined to comment, referring questions to the U.S. government.Immigration Lawyers

"It is imperative we find the right balance between security and facilitation, and we stand ready to support the administration and Congress to achieve this goal," said Roger Dow, chief executive officer of the U.S. Travel Association, a nonprofit lobbying group, Lawyers "are trying to makes sense of what happened," said Christine Alden, an immigration attorney in Miami. "It's all really far-reaching. It's going to affect businesses, families and students going back to school," she said.

The U.S. has treaties with some of the targeted counties that allow investors to visit the U.S. under the E-2 visa program, she said. Those people won't be allowed to come run their businesses. Oil companies, tech companies and others that depend on foreign workers may see them stranded overseas.

Trump's Signing Of Immigrant Ban Puts Pentagon In Uncomfortable Light

By Helene Cooper

New York Times, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON — Six months ago, Jim Mattis stood at a lectern at the Hoover Institution, a conservative think tank at Stanford University, and sharply criticized Donald J. Trump's campaign proposal for a ban on Muslim immigration, saying that such a move would distress American allies around the world.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"This kind of thing is causing us great damage right now, and it's sending shock waves through the international system," Mr. Mattis said.

On Friday, in a Pentagon room dedicated to men and women who have received the country's highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor, Mr. Mattis, now the country's defense secretary, stood behind his new commander in chief, President Trump, as he signed an executive order on immigration. The order suspended entry of all refugees to the United States for 120 days, barred Syrian refugees indefinitely and blocked entry for 90 days for citizens of seven predominantly Muslim countries. It also allows Christians to be granted priority over Muslims.

For Mr. Mattis, it was an uncomfortable end to a tumultuous first week as defense secretary that found him choosing which battles to fight and which to step away from.

He won a huge one on Friday, when Mr. Trump, in a remarkable show of deference, said that he would let Mr. Mattis "override" his view that torture could be effective in interrogations. Mr. Mattis is a strong opponent of such techniques.

But Mr. Mattis was also outflanked by the White House, which chose the Pentagon to unveil Mr. Trump's executive order on immigration, a sharply divisive move in front of military leaders who view themselves as apolitical.

In a building where uniformed men and women work alongside civilian officials, several rank-and-file workers expressed outrage that Mr. Trump would use the Defense Department, home to a military that includes people of many faiths, including Islam, to announce that he was blocking visa applicants from Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen.

"Using the military as a backdrop for politically charged activities is bad for the military," said Kori Schake, a Hoover Institution fellow who edited the new book "Warriors and Citizens: American Views of Our Military" with Mr. Mattis. She added that associating the military with "unconstitutional policies is especially damaging, since our military take their oath to the Constitution, not to the president."

The president cited the Sept. 11 attacks in his decision to issue the immigration restrictions, which he cast in national security terms. "We will never forget the lessons of 9/11," he said, nor the people "who lost their lives at the Pentagon."

But none of the 19 terrorists who were on the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon and in Shanksville, Pa., were from any of the countries on Mr. Trump's visa ban list.

Instead, Iraq, where the American military is fighting with Iraqi security forces against the Islamic State, is among the countries on the list. Military officials have repeatedly called the nation an American ally.

"After all the money and lives spent in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Pentagon knows better than anyone that terrorism is a problem of a small number of enemies embedded in a population of people you need to win over," said Jon B. Alterman, director of the Middle East Program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "I don't see the part of this that's meant to win over anyone."

Two people close to Mr. Mattis, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they said they were wary of undercutting him, said he was still sharply opposed to the Muslim ban. But he spent this week battling the White House on other issues, including the establishment of "safe zones" in Syria, something the Pentagon has long opposed because it would deepen American involvement in the war there, out of the executive order.

Military officials sought to distance the Pentagon from the immigration ban, and focused instead on the second executive order that Mr. Trump signed at the Pentagon, which called for plans to improve military readiness. Mr. Mattis, standing behind Mr. Trump, took only the ceremonial pen that Mr. Trump used to sign the military readiness order. Mr. Trump gave the other one to Vice President Mike Pence.

Afterward, the Defense Department put out a statement about Mr. Trump's visit to the Pentagon that pointedly made no mention of the Muslim ban. "The secretary shares the president's goal of ensuring our military leaders have the support they need to accelerate the campaign against ISIS, and to build combat readiness now and for the future," Capt. Jeff Davis, the Pentagon spokesman, said in the statement.

Last week, the Defense Department posted a message on Twitter about a former refugee who became a Marine. "From refugee to #Marine. @USMC Cpl Ali J. Mohammed takes the fight to the doorstep of those who cast his family out," it read.

A military official noted on Saturday that the American military, which uses translators and fixers in Iraq and Syria, two of the countries on the banned list, would find it harder to recruit, since the Pentagon has long offered the promise of refuge in America.

"It's very difficult for people to cooperate with the United States military when they feel humiliated by the United States," said Vali Nasr, dean of the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins University.

"The Iraqi situation is the most grievous," Mr. Nasr added. "We are fighting a war with the Iraqis, against ISIS. How can we fight with them when the message from the White House is discriminatory?"

US Suspends Immigration Program Helping Non-Muslim Iranians

By George Jahn And Alicia A. Caldwell

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

VIENNA (AP) – Austria has shut its door to about 300 non-Muslim Iranians hoping to use the country as a way station before establishing new homes in the United States,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Associated Press has learned. The action is an early ripple effect of U.S. President Donald Trump's effort to clamp down on refugee admissions.

Under a 27-year-old program originally approved by Congress to help Jews in the former Soviet Union, Austria had been serving until recently as a conduit for Iranian Jews, Christians and Baha'i, who were at risk in their home country and eligible to resettle in the United States. Iran has banned the Baha'i religion, which was founded in 1844 by a Persian nobleman considered a prophet by followers.

U.S. officials had been interviewing the candidates in Austria because they cannot do so in Iran. But the United States suspended the so-called "Iranian Lautenberg Program" in recent days, according to Austrian officials, who in turn stopped Iranians from reaching their territory. It's unclear when the program might restart.

The episode isn't directly linked to an executive order Trump signed Friday that orders strict new screening for refugees to keep "radical Islamic terrorists" out of the United States. But it reflects the knock-on effects already occurring from his tougher line on immigration and refugees. Similar to how tighter German migration rules had consequences across Europe, Trump's actions could lead other nations to take a harder look at people wishing to use their territories as transit points.

The net result could be even tougher conditions for people hoping to escape war and persecution for a better life abroad. There are more than 20 million refugees worldwide, according to the United Nations.

Austrian Foreign Ministry spokesman Thomas Schnoell said the Alpine country acted after "U.S. authorities told us that the onward trip for people to the U.S.A., who received visas from Austrian authorities as part of the program, would be put on hold for now."

A State Department email sent Tuesday said the Austrian government had "electronically canceled" its visas for applicants who hadn't yet reached Austria. If they try to reach Austria anyway, they will be permanently blocked from Austria, according to the email, which was obtained by AP.

Schnoell said the move affects about 300 Iranians with visas waiting to enter Austria. He said about 100 of them had been tracked down and informed that they can no longer do so. The search continues for the rest through airline ticket bookings and other means, Schnoell said.

Other officials said a small number of Iranians with such short-term visas already were in Austria. It wasn't immediately clear what would happen with them.

The end of the program, named for former Sen. Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey, could have broad implications for religious minorities in Iran.

HIAS, a global Jewish nonprofit organization that works to protect refugees, says on its website that ending the U.S.-Austrian partnership "puts people seeking religious freedom in danger and sends the wrong message about the pervasive violations of religious freedom in Iran."

Trump is expected to pause the flow of all refugees to the U.S. and indefinitely bar those fleeing war-torn Syria. The president's upcoming order is also expected to suspend issuing visas for people from several predominantly Muslim countries – Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen – for at least 30 days, according to a draft executive order obtained by the AP.

Cancellation of the U.S. program could mean Iranians arriving in Austria with temporary visas would seek asylum in Austria. Immigration is a highly sensitive issue throughout Europe, which is struggling to deal with hundreds of thousands of people from Syria, North Africa and beyond.

Austria, a nation of fewer than 9 million people, is already strained by efforts to accommodate and integrate more than 100,000 migrants who have flowed in since 2015.

State Dept Web Page On Refugees Disappears

By Brooke Seipel

The Hill, January 27, 2017

Two pages on the State Department website that chronicled the "myths and facts" about refugees have been removed.

On Friday, President Trump issued an executive order banning Syrian refugees from entering the country.

The two web pages, one titled "Myths and Facts on Refugees, Migration, and Humanitarian Assistance," and the other "Myths and Facts: Resettling Syrian Refugees," had been removed as of Friday, though the exact timing of when they were taken down is unclear.

The White House and federal agencies have been updating web sites and social media as part of the routine transition to the new administration. Both pages were created and remained up throughout Obama's presidency.

The old pages can still be found through a cache online.

Both of the pages included information on how the U.S. takes in refugees and its work on the refugee crisis.

One post read:

"MYTH: The United States government brings refugees here without screening."

"FACT: All refugees of all nationalities considered for admission to the United States are subject to the highest level of security checks of any category of traveler to our country, involving multiple federal intelligence, security and law enforcement agencies, such as the National Counterterrorism Center, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Departments of Homeland Security, State and Defense, in order to ensure that those admitted are not known to pose a threat to our country. The safeguards include biometric (fingerprint) and biographic checks, and an interview by specially trained DHS officers who scrutinize the applicant's explanation of individual circumstances to ensure the applicant is a bona fide refugee . Mindful of the particular conditions of the Syria crisis, Syrian refugees go through an enhanced level of review."

The number of website pages have disappeared as Trump gets his administration up and running, including pages on LGBT rights and climate change on the White House website.

A Sweeping Order Is Unlikely To Reduce Terrorist Threat

By Scott Shane

New York Times, January 28, 2017

Rarely does an executive order announce a more straightforward and laudable purpose than the one President Trump signed on Friday: "Protecting the Nation From Foreign Terrorist Entry Into the United States." But the president's directive is unlikely to significantly reduce the terrorist threat in the United States, which has been a minuscule part of the overall toll of violence since 2001. Many experts believe the order's unintended consequences will make the threat worse.

While the order requires the Department of Homeland Security to issue a report within 180 days providing detailed statistics on foreign nationals who commit acts of violence, terrorism researchers have already produced rich and revealing data. For instance: Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, no one has been killed in this country in a terrorist attack by anyone who emigrated from, or whose parents emigrated from, any of the seven countries named in the order's four-month visa ban: Syria, Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen, according to Charles Kurzman, a sociology professor at the University of North Carolina.

Of Muslim Americans involved in violent extremism of any kind — for instance, charged with plotting terrorism or supporting a terrorist group — only 23 percent had family backgrounds in those countries, said Mr. Kurzman, who just published the latest of his annual studies of Muslim Americans and terrorism.

The larger point of experts is that jihadist attacks garner news attention that far outstrips their prevalence in the United States, and the president's order appears to be designed to address not a rational calculation of risks but the visceral fears that terrorists set out to inflame.

There was a random quality to the list of countries: It excluded Saudi Arabia and Egypt, where the founders of Al Qaeda and many other jihadist groups have come from. Also excluded are Pakistan and Afghanistan, where persistent extremism and decades of war have produced militants who have occasionally reached the United States. Notably, perhaps, the list avoided Muslim countries where Mr. Trump has major business ventures.

Nor did the list include the European countries in which disenfranchised Muslim communities have become hotbeds of militancy, leading to major attacks in the name of the Islamic State in Paris and Brussels. Because no visas are required for travel by most European citizens to the United States, and because of the volume of tourism and business, prohibiting travel from Europe would have been far more difficult and consequential than banning it from only the seven countries named.

By Mr. Kurzman's count, 123 people have been killed in the United States by Muslim terrorists since the 2001 attacks — out of a total of more than 230,000 killings, by gang members, drug dealers, angry spouses, white supremacists, psychopaths, drunks and people of every description. So the order addresses, at most, one-1,870th of the problem of lethal violence in America. If the toll of 9/11 is included, jihadists still account for just over 1 percent of killings.

"My advice to the new administration would be to declare victory," Mr. Kurzman said. For the average American, he added, "your odds of being victimized by a terrorist attack are infinitesimal."

But terrorists — the root of the word means "to cause to tremble" — do not operate in the realm of dry facts and statistics. Their purpose is to terrify, and they use random and spectacular violence to do it, with an invaluable assist from the saturation coverage on cable television and news websites that such outrages inevitably draw.

To the rational calculations of Mr. Kurzman, one might simply reply with the list of American cities where horrific jihadist attacks have occurred in recent years: Boston, San Bernardino, Orlando — place names that conjure up images of ghastly wounds, bullet-ridden corpses and frightened people running for cover. In Gallup polls, the number of Americans "very worried" or "somewhat worried" about such attacks generally hovers between 30 and 50 percent, with understandable spikes after new attacks.

In the political realm, where emotions and symbols hold sway, Mr. Trump's order may reassure some Americans that they are safer from terrorism, and more generally, from concerns that Muslim immigrants may bring an alien culture. (While ostensibly addressing terrorism, it also says that the United States should be protected against those with "hostile attitudes toward it and its founding principles" or those "who do not support the Constitution.")

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The trouble with such reassurance, even if it is effective, is that it comes at a high cost, in the view of many experts on terrorism. That cost will be counted not just domestically but also abroad, where the United States relies on allies, including Muslim countries, for intelligence and other help against terrorism.

"In my opinion, this is just a huge mistake in terms of counterterrorism cooperation," said Daniel Benjamin, formerly the State Department's top counterterrorism official and now a scholar at Dartmouth. "For the life of me, I don't see why we would want to alienate the Iraqis when they are the ground force against ISIS."

At home as well, Mr. Benjamin said, the president's order is likely to prove counterproductive. The jihadist threat in the United States has turned out to be largely homegrown, he said, and the order will encourage precisely the resentments and anxieties on the part of Muslims that fuel, in rare cases, support for the ideology of the Islamic State or Al Qaeda.

"It sends an unmistakable message to the American Muslim community that they are facing discrimination and isolation," Mr. Benjamin said. That, he said, will "feed the jihadist narrative" that the United States is at war with Islam, potentially encouraging a few more Muslims to plot violence.

For an action aimed at terrorism, the order appeared to garner little or no support among experts and former officials of every political stripe with experience in the field. Jonathan Schanzer, vice president for research at the conservative Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, said that if the temporary visa ban was used to review and improve immigration vetting procedures, it might be justified.

But he added that he knew of no obvious problems with those procedures, and no specific plans to address such issues over the 120-day ban. "The order appears to be based mainly on a campaign promise," he said.

Mr. Schanzer said he was frustrated that during the Obama administration, there had been inadequate attention to the ultimate driver of refugee flows and jihadist terrorism in the United States and elsewhere. "We have several bloody, complex and interlocking conflicts in the Middle East," he said. "It's the job of the new administration to come up with policies that address those conflicts. Admittedly, that is not easy."

Much easier, clearly, is issuing an executive order with political appeal and a title that seems to smack of common sense. But as the Trump administration is finding out, such pronouncements from an American president have many consequences, not all of them intended, anticipated or desired.

Trump Redefines The Enemy And 15 Years Of Counterterrorism Policy

By Greg Jaffe

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

In just his first week in the White House, President Trump has sought to redefine America's most lethal enemy in terms far broader than his post-9/11 predecessors.

The net result of Trump's new approach — outlined in speeches, interviews and executive orders — is a vast departure for a country that has often struggled over the past 15 years to say whether it is at war and precisely who it is fighting.

With a few sweeping moves, Trump has answered those questions with a clarity that is refreshing to his supporters and alarming to some U.S. counterterrorism officials as well as most of the Muslim world.

For Trump and his senior policy advisers, America is locked in a world war for its very survival, and the enemies in this wide-ranging battle are not only radical Islamist terrorists but a chaotic, violent and angry Muslim world.

"The world is as angry as it gets," Trump said last week from the White House. "Take a look at what's happening with Aleppo. Take a look at what's happening in Mosul. Take a look at what's going on in the Middle East. . . . The world is a mess."

One day later, in an appearance at the Pentagon and in signing an executive order — "Protecting the Nation From Foreign Terrorist Entry Into the United States" — Trump laid out his plan to deal with what he had described as a vast and pressing threat. He closed America's borders to all refugees temporarily and additionally suspended the entry of anyone from Iraq, Syria and five other predominantly Muslim countries.

"The optic of this is really awful," said Nada Bakos, a former CIA analyst, of the refu-gee ban. "What they've done goes too far. All it does is help [Islamic State] recruiting."

Trump also vowed new "extreme vetting measures" to permanently keep radical Islamist terrorists out of the United States and promised to give Christians from the Middle East and other minority religions in the region priority over Muslim refugees.

Finally, he promised to pump new money into America's military, what he called "a great rebuilding of the armed services of the United States."

Both former presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama had defined the enemy in significantly narrower terms while in office, eager to avoid any moves that might make it appear as if the United States was at war with Islam.

For Bush, the enemy was al-Qaeda and state sponsors of terrorism to include former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, Iran and the Taliban. Obama insisted that Bush's definition was a recipe for "endless war" and singled out an even smaller group. To him, the enemy was a series of terrorist death cults that he said were perverting the peaceful religion of Islam.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The executive order on immigration and refugees was produced at a "frenetic pace" that included none of the interagency reviews that characterized similar orders in the Bush and Obama administrations, a senior U.S. counterterrorism official said.

"The process was remarkable," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive internal deliberations. "Nobody in the counterterrorism community pushed for this. None of us ever asked for it."

Trump described the order as a key cog in an effort to prevent terrorists from entering the United States, but the policy does not affect countries such as Saudi Arabia, Pakistan or Egypt, whose citizens have launched terrorist attacks inside the United States. Not one of the 19 hijackers who struck on 9/11 came from a country targeted by the order.

The measure drew negative responses across the world, some of which was heard by U.S. forces on the ground in the Middle East.

U.S. commanders advising Iraqi forces reported back that their partners were mystified by the order. "It's already flowing back," said the senior counterterrorism official. "They are asking, 'What do you think of us? Do you see us as the threat?' "

Some Iraqi lawmakers proposed banning U.S. troops and civilians from entering Iraq — an action, if followed through, that could lead the authorities in Baghdad to turn to Russia and seek more support from Iran.

Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif tweeted that the ban would be "recorded in history as a great gift to extremists and their supporters."

Trump on Saturday described the move as sensible and not aimed at any particular religious group.

"It's not a Muslim ban, but we were totally prepared," he told reporters in the Oval Office. "It's working out very nicely, you see it at the airports, you see it all over . . . and we're going to have a very, very strict ban and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years."

The stark departure from American policy over the past 15 years is a reflection not only of Trump but the somewhat dystopian vision of his closest advisers.

"We're at the very beginning stages of a very brutal and bloody conflict," said Stephen K. Bannon, Trump's chief strategist, in a 2014 speech to a Vatican conference. "We are in an outright war against jihadist Islamic fascism and this war is . . . metastasizing far quicker than governments can handle it."

Michael Flynn, Trump's national security adviser, similarly describes the fight against al-Qaeda and the Islamic State as a "world war."

"We could lose," he wrote in his recent book, "The Field of Fight." "In fact, right now we're losing."

Those sorts of analyses represent a radical departure from Obama, who believed that the United States had succumbed to a "season of fear" following the 9/11 attacks that produced a disastrous war in Iraq and a betrayal of America's core values. As commander in chief, he banned torture — a policy Trump has suggested he might revisit — and sought unsuccessfully to close the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"Shameful" was the word that Obama used to describe calls from Trump and other presidential candidates to impose religious tests on refugees or immigrants.

Obama was convinced that groups like al-Qaeda and the Islamic State did not pose an existential threat to the country. Rather, he suggested that the biggest threat came from an overreaction to the attacks that would cause the United States to turn away from the world.

His approach stressed America's fearlessness in the face of attacks. "That's who the American people are — determined and not to be messed with," Obama said in describing his counterterrorism strategy in 2013. "Now we need a strategy and a politics that reflects this resilient spirit."

Trump, meanwhile, has chosen a different route.

Open Doors, Slamming Gates: The Tumultuous Politics Of U.S. Immigration Policy

By Marc Fisher

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

In his farewell address to the nation in 1989, President Ronald Reagan told the story of a Navy sailor patrolling the South China Sea who came upon a "leaky little boat" crammed with refugees from Indochina trying to find a way to America.

"Hello, American sailor," a man in the boat shouted up to the Navy vessel. "Hello, freedom man." Reagan couldn't get that moment out of his mind because of what it said about what the United States meant — to those who live here and to the rest of the world.

But history reveals that even as U.S. policy moved from the restrictive immigration policies of a century ago to Reagan's advocacy of an open door to refugees, public opinion has continued to oscillate. President Trump's move Friday to bar entry into the United States for residents of seven majority-Muslim countries harks back to a period when the U.S. government regularly banned immigrants and refugees from countries whose people were considered inferior, dangerous or incompatible with American values.

Trump's executive action marks the first time a president has sought to bar people because of their nation of origin — or their religion, as only Muslim-dominated countries are included in the order — since the 1965 Immigration and Nationality Act scrapped national-origin quotas, putting the focus instead on immigrants' skills and personal connections to Americans.

"This is a paradigm shift," said David Bier, who studies immigration policy at the Cato Institute, the libertarian think tank. "This is an explicit rejection of the approach that George W. Bush and Barack Obama embraced, in which a big part of the war on terror was to bring in allies, to prove we're not waging a war on Islam and to show that we're an open society toward Muslims."

The history of this nation of immigrants is one of open doors and gates slammed shut, of welcoming words like those engraved inside the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty ("Give me your tired, your poor, / Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free, / The wretched refuse of your teeming shore") and of generations of politicians and activists proclaiming that American values would be undermined by a new influx of foreigners.

"Both open and restrictive refu-gee policies have gotten very high approval in polls through the years," said Roger Daniels, a historian of U.S. immigration and professor emeritus at the University of Cincinnati. "In times of trouble, nativist policies — what Trump would call 'America First' — get more attention. Since colonial times, there's been a strong strain of nativism that either dominates or is just ignored."

"America must remain American," President Calvin Coolidge said in 1924 as he signed into law a measure that ended the biggest wave of immigration in U.S. history. The new law used the then-popular pseudoscience of eugenics to set drastic limits on entry by groups the government considered "socially inadequate" — mainly Italians and Eastern European Jews.

That same year, that same president declared the Statue of Liberty a national monument. And four decades later, President Lyndon B. Johnson traveled to the statue to sign the act that is still the basis of U.S. immigration policy. The 1965 law, Johnson said, "corrects a cruel and enduring wrong. . . . for over four decades, the immigration policy of the United States has been twisted and distorted by the harsh injustice of the national origins quota system. Under that system, the ability of new immigrants to come to America depended on the country of their birth. Today . . . this system is abolished."

Bier and others argue that the Trump order is illegal because it seeks to restore national origin as a factor in deciding who gets into the country. The Trump administration contends that the president has the authority to suspend entry for any group he finds detrimental to the national interest.

However that issue plays out in the courts, the debate over how to decide who comes to the United States stretches back centuries and has been a hot issue in presidential and local elections for several decades. Although every president since Franklin D. Roosevelt has supported admitting refugees fleeing political and religious persecution, those presidents has also struggled to defend such policies against strong voices advocating tighter limits on newcomers.

Near the end of World War II, Roosevelt, after a long period of resisting pleas by American Jews to admit European Jews fleeing the Nazis' program of extermination, decided to allow 1,000 refugees into the country and put them at an Army base in Upstate New York.

"That's the beginning of the presidential authority to interfere with immigration policy," Daniels said. "And it has continued ever since."

Trump's focus on blocking people from predominantly Muslim countries and carving out openings for Christians fleeing those countries "is at variance with everything we've done since Roosevelt, Truman and Eisenhower built our approach to refugees," Daniels said.

Perhaps paradoxically, the gates to the United States have tended not to tighten during wartime — in the late 2000s, George W. Bush increased the flow of refugees into the country as a way to thank people who had helped U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, and to demonstrate that he was serious about attacking terrorism rather than Islam.

Economic hardship has sometimes led to louder calls for more restrictive immigration and refu-gee policies, historians say, but surges of nativist sentiment have emerged more from cultural backlash than from hard times or wartime. The restrictive 1924 law, for example, "came about in the Roaring Twenties, a time of great economic growth," Bier noted.

From the late 19th century through the 1930s, popular belief in eugenics, along with rivalries among religious groups, fed movements aimed against Catholics, Jews, Eastern Europeans, Asians and Africans.

"It's really the civil rights movement of the 1960s that changed the approach," Bier said. After the Civil Rights Act passed in 1964, ending legal segregation and banning employment discrimination based on race, religion or national origin, the idea of admitting immigrants based on where they came from seemed anachronistic.

In the 1980s, the immigration debate centered on illegal immigration; policies of that period were driven by the idea that expanding legal pathways into the country might curb the flow of illegal entrants. It didn't work; the battle over illegal immigration continued.

Some anti-immigration activists argued that the problem was not limited to illegal immigration but extended to all newcomers. Those activists focused on crimes committed by noncitizens, and Trump campaigned on that theme, highlighting stories of Americans whose loved ones had been killed by immigrants.

That approach won support from activists who have long sought not only a wall on the U.S.-Mexican border but also sharp cuts in legal immigration. Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, which seeks "low-immigration" policies, welcomed Trump's latest moves, but noted that executive action is not enough. A "reduction in legal immigration — which is the most important objective from a jobs or welfare or even security perspective — has to come from Congress," Krikorian said in a blog post.

"We're seeing populism take control of immigration policy for the first time" since World War II, Bier said. "You don't have leaders in politics right now who are willing to say that we welcome people fleeing the enemies of the United States."

Reagan began and ended his farewell speech with powerful pleas for the country to open its arms. The "shining city upon a hill" that he wanted America to be was, he said, a place "teeming with people of all kinds living in harmony and peace. . . . And if there had to be city walls, the walls had doors and the doors were open to anyone with the will and the heart to get here."

Will We Be Forced Into A Religious Test? The Dangerous Questions Muslims Are Facing.

By Shadi Hamid

There is panic at the airport. Some of the stories, after President Trump issued his executive order targeting Muslim immigrants, remind me of what I saw in the Middle East. No one has been killed, of course. But when an Iraqi who risked his life an interpreter for the Army arrives in New York only to be denied entry, it has the hallmarks of a different world, one he probably thought he had left behind: the fear of not knowing; the manipulation of law; the capriciousness of strongmen in midflight; and families divided in the name of politics.

The executive order may, in fact, be illegal, causing considerable confusion over what it means for the hundreds of thousands of legal U.S. residents from the seven Muslim countries listed. The legal debate and challenges will probably be with us for some time, maybe for the long remainder of Trump's tenure. The president's decree, though, is just as frightening — perhaps even more so — for what it tells us about a young presidency and how the office intends to use its power in its flurry of seemingly manic energy and activity.

With several notable exceptions, such as Defense Secretary James Mattis, a worryingly large number of Trump advisers and appointees share what, at best, can be described as a suspicion of not just Islam but Muslims. The executive order underscores the new administration's fixation on what it views not as a terrorist threat but a civilizational one in which the very act of being Muslim is grounds for scrutiny.

The president's order prioritizes "refugee claims made by individuals on the basis of religious-based persecution," which is understandable enough, because Muslims and Christians alike (and Muslims more so) are targets of groups like the Islamic State.

One clause, however, imposes a religious test, almost overwhelming in its starkness: "The religion of the individual [must be] a minority religion in the individual's country of nationality." In other words, they cannot be Muslim regardless of the level of persecution they face. As Reza Aslan, an author who is Muslim, writes: "A Christian fleeing discrimination in Yemen would be given entry, but a Shia facing death and starvation would not."

Islam, at least to some in Trump's inner circle, is not considered a religion. As national security adviser Michael Flynn has said: "Islam is a political ideology masked behind a religion, using religion as an advantage against us. Islam is a political ideology. Sharia, the law of Islam, OK? Sharia is the law. Just like our Constitution is our law." Since Muslims wouldn't know how to pray, fast or give charity (zakat) without "sharia," then any Muslim who observes any aspect of their faith or partakes in any ritual might have dual loyalties, to the clashing legal traditions of Flynn's imagination.

Trump's early moves are not just an attack on some of the most vulnerable refugees, but on Islam as an overarching ideological threat. It is easy to see echoes of Trump surrogate and former House speaker Newt Gingrich's July remarks, which at the time may have seemed like musings of a man who would never again be close to the centers of American power.

"We should frankly test every person here who is of a Muslim background, and if they believe in sharia, they should be deported," Gingrich said. It wasn't clear whether Gingrich had in mind citizens and noncitizens alike or just the latter, but even the most charitable reading was sufficiently ominous.

I did not come of political age during the Cold War, so perhaps the language of ideological tests shouldn't be as surprising as I found it while parsing the text of the executive order.

This is noteworthy: "The United States cannot, and should not, admit those who do not support the Constitution, or those who would place violent ideologies over American law." What constitutes "supporting" the Constitution, especially considering that our own president has an ambivalent relationship with many of its amendments, including the first? How is that to be judged?

Ideological tests are something that American Muslims, including my family and I, are safe from. But I shudder to think that my parents, upon entering the United States as immigrants decades ago, would have been "tested" for sufficient adherence to the Constitution by an administration that already held them in suspicion. Would they have been asked to disavow aspects of their own religion, culture or identity?

Trump's actions didn't just begin with his presidency. They began when Trump, the candidate, propelled Muslims to the center of his agenda. For the first time, in my own country, I felt like an object of analysis.

I remember when Trump first proposed his Muslim immigration ban in December 2015 and hearing it discussed endlessly on television. Everything seemed to be about "us."

I was no longer just who I happened to be but a member of a group that was being debated and dissected as a potential threat. We had become a problem, and all problems need to be resolved. In the coming four or eight years or perhaps longer, we will find out what, exactly, that means.

Trump Shuts Door On Refugees, But Will The US Be Safer?

By Eric Tucker

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Donald Trump says his halt to immigration from seven Muslim-majority nations and ban on refugees is being done in the name of national security. But it's not clear that these measures will help prevent attacks on American soil, and they could wind up emboldening extremists who already view the U.S. as at war with Islam.

The list of countries does not include Saudi Arabia, where the majority of the Sept. 11 hijackers were from, and recent high-profile acts of deadly extremist violence have been carried out either by U.S. citizens or by individuals whose families weren't from the nations singled out.

The admissions ban announced Friday also does not directly address a more urgent law enforcement concern: homegrown violent extremists already in the United States who plot their attacks without any overseas connections or contacts.

"The primary terrorism-related threat facing the U.S. today comes from individuals living here who become inspired by what they see on the internet who carry out attacks independent of any terrorist organization," said John Cohen, a former Department of Homeland Security counterterrorism official who worked in government under Democratic and Republican administrations and who has been involved in refugee vetting policy.

The FBI has for years been concerned by the prospect of airplane bomb plots and terrorists dispatched from overseas to commit violence in America. But the ascendancy of the Islamic State, and the group's ability through slick and easily accessible propaganda to reach followers in all corners of the country, has been a more immediate challenge – and a more realistic danger – for counterterrorism officials.

"Dealing with that threat should be a top priority for this administration," Cohen said.

The executive order suspends refugee admissions for 120 days and bars all immigration for 90 days from Muslim-majority countries with terrorism concerns: Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen.

It indefinitely bars the processing of refugees from Syria, a country that's been of particular alarm to the FBI even though the number of Americans who have looked to travel there to fight with the Islamic State has been dwindling.

But the culprits of recent deadly terror attacks aren't linked to the countries singled out by Trump's order.

Omar Mateen, the man responsible for the Orlando nightclub shooting, the deadliest terror attack in the U.S. since the Sept. 11 attacks, was born in New York to Afghan parents.

Syed Rizwan Farook, who took part in the December 2015 San Bernardino attack, was born in Chicago. His wife, Tashfeen Malik, had been living in Pakistan and visiting family in Saudi Arabia before she passed the background check and entered the U.S.

The brothers who bombed the Boston Marathon were ethnic Chechens who had been living in the U.S.

In general, Islamic extremists have accounted for a minuscule amount of the roughly 240,000 murders since Sept. 11, 2001.

Charles Kurzman, a sociology professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill who has studied the issue, said his research shows that people with ancestry from the seven nations in the executive order have accounted for only a small fraction of extremist-related arrests and disrupted plots since Sept. 11.

"I can only conclude that this is whipping up fear and hostility toward Americans who have family background from these countries," Kurzman said.

Still, while refugees are subject to screening – including in-person interviews, checks with law enforcement databases and collection of biometric data, when available – the process is not perfect.

FBI counterterrorism officials have long expressed concern about the lack of background information on refugees from Syria, a home base of the Islamic State, and Director James Comey has said that he could not guarantee a mistake-free vetting process.

There have been isolated incidents of refugees later accused in terror-related plots.

An Iraqi refugee who entered the U.S. in 2009, for instance, pleaded guilty in Houston in October to attempting to provide material support to the Islamic State. Two Iraqi refugees who lived in Kentucky are now in prison after having been convicted in a plot to send sniper rifles, Stinger missiles and money to al-Qaida operatives waging an insurgency back home.

And the man accused in the November car-and-knife attack at Ohio State University was a refugee originally from Somalia who, as an adolescent, moved with his family to the United States in 2014 after living in Pakistan.

Though not immune from lapses, the screening process has improved over the years, Cohen said. He said he was concerned that the refugee ban could deter Muslim-majority countries from cooperating with the U.S. on policy matters and could embolden an extremist already bent on violence.

"That's something," Cohen said, "that law enforcement folks are going to be factoring into their violence prevention efforts."

There Have Been No Fatal Terror Attacks In The U.S. By Immigrants From The 7 Banned Muslim Countries

More evidence that the ban makes no sense.

By Christopher Mathias

Huffington Post, January 28, 2017

There have been zero fatal terror attacks on U.S. soil since 1975 by immigrants from the seven Muslim-majority countries President Donald Trump targeted with immigration bans on Friday, further highlighting the needlessness and cruelty of the president's executive order.

Between 1975 and 2015, foreign nationals from Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen killed exactly zero Americans on U.S. soil, according to an analysis of terror attacks by the Cato Institute.

Moreover, a report released this week shows that Muslim Americans with family backgrounds in those seven countries have killed no Americans over the last 15 years.

Twenty-three percent of the Muslim Americans involved with violent extremist plots since Sept. 11, 2001, had family backgrounds in Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria or Yemen, according to a Triangle Center on Terrorism and Homeland Security report released this week. None of those plots resulted in American deaths.

Similarly, none of the 19 plane hijackers on 9/11 were from any of those seven countries.

"Contrary to alarmist political rhetoric, the appeal of revolutionary violence has remained very limited among Muslim-Americans," Charles Kurzman, a professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the author of the Triangle Center report, said in a statement. "Let's use this empirical evidence to guide our policy-making and public debates on violent extremism."

This is a dramatic and misdirected overreaction to a relatively small-scale problem. Charles Kurzman, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill professor

On Friday afternoon, Trump issued an executive order indefinitely banning Syrian refugee admissions, temporarily banning entry of people from the seven aforementioned majority-Muslim countries and suspending visas to countries of "particular concern."

The order, at the end of Trump's first week as president, is an extension of a presidential campaign in which Trump routinely stirred fears and peddled misinformation about Muslims in America. It also partially fulfills Trump's 2015 call to ban all Muslims from entering the U.S.

"This is a dramatic and misdirected overreaction to a relatively small-scale problem," Kurzman wrote in The WorldPost Thursday in anticipation of Trump's executive order.

The threat of Muslim American involvement in violent extremism is greatly inflated, Kurzman wrote, and violence by Muslim Americans represents an incredibly small fraction of overall violence in this country.

Kurzman told The Huffington Post he defined "Muslim Americans" in his report as people who had lived in the U.S. at least a year before radicalization. There were 46 such Muslim Americans associated with violent extremism in 2016, according to the report, a 40 percent drop from the year before.

Of those 46 people, Kurzman said, 26 were U.S. citizens, six were of unknown nationality and the rest were immigrants, only one of whom was undocumented.

The extremism of nearly half of those 46 Muslim Americans entailed them traveling or attempting to travel to join militant groups in the Middle East.

Twenty-three were involved or allegedly involved in plots against U.S. targets, resulting in 54 deaths. (Forty-nine of those deaths occurred when 29-year-old Omar Mateen opened fire in a Florida nightclub in June.)

According to the report, that brings the total number of U.S. deaths caused by Muslim American extremists since 9/11 to 123.

By way of comparison, in 2016 alone, 188 people were killed on U.S. soil in mass shootings not involving Muslim American extremists, the report says. Meanwhile, there have been 230,000 murders in the U.S. since 9/11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

David Schanzer, director at the Triangle Center, said in a statement that "it is flatly untrue that America is deeply threatened by violent extremism by Muslim-Americans; attacks by Muslims accounted for only one third of one percent of all murders in America last year."

Moreover, according to the State Department, of the nearly 800,000 refugees who have come to the U.S. since 9/11, fewer than 20 have been arrested on terrorism charges.

But, Schanzer added, "it is also untrue that violent extremism can be ignored as a problem within the Muslim-American community. Collaborative efforts between government agencies and Muslim-Americans to address this problem are justified and needed."

In his WorldPost article Thursday, Kurzman wrote that "instead of inflating the threat of extremism, Trump and the rest of us ought to treat it as the small-time criminal enterprise that it is, matching our response to the scale of the problem."

"Let's stand strong," he wrote. "Stop giving terrorists the obsessive attention and inflated importance that they crave."

Little National Security Benefit To Trump's Executive Order On Immigration

By Alex Nowrasteh

Little National Security Benefit to Trump's Executive Order on Immigration

Cato At Liberty

Alex Nowrasteh

Tomorrow, President Trump is expected to sign an executive order enacting a 30-day suspension of all visas for nationals from Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen. Foreigners from those seven nations have killed zero Americans in terrorist attacks on U.S. soil between 1975 and the end of 2015. Six Iranians, six Sudanese, two Somalis, two Iraqis, and one Yemini have been convicted of attempting or carrying out terrorist attacks on U.S. soil. Zero Libyans or Syrians have been convicted of planning a terrorist attack on U.S. soil during that time period.

Many other foreigners have been convicted of terrorism-related offenses that did not include planning a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. One list released by Senator Jeff Sessions (R-AL) details 580 terror-related convictions since 9/11. This incomplete list probably influenced which countries are temporarily banned, and likely provided justification for another section of Trump's executive order, which directs the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to release all information on foreign-born terrorists going forward, and requires additional DHS reports to study foreign-born terrorism.

I exhaustively evaluated Senator Sessions' list of convictions based on publicly available data and discovered some startling details.

First, 241 of the convictions (42 percent) were not for terrorism offenses. Senator Sessions puffed his numbers by including "terrorism-related convictions," a nebulous category that includes investigations that begin due to a terrorism tip but then end in non-terrorism convictions. My favorite examples of this are the convictions of Nasser Abuali, Hussein Abuali, and Rabi Ahmed. An informant told the FBI that the trio tried to purchase a rocket-propelled grenade launcher, but the FBI found no evidence supporting the accusation. The three individuals were instead convicted of receiving two truckloads of stolen cereal. That is a crime but it is not terrorism.

Second, only 40 of the 580 convictions (6.9 percent) were for foreigners planning a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. Seeking to join a foreign terrorist group overseas, material support for a foreign terrorist, and seeking to commit an act of terror on foreign soil account for 180 of the 580 convictions (31 percent). Terrorism on foreign soil is a crime, should be a crime, and those convicted of these offenses should be punished severely but the government cannot claim that these convictions made America safe again because these folks were not targeting U.S. soil.

Third, 92 of the 580 convictions (16 percent) were for U.S. born citizens. No change in immigration law, visa limitations, or more rigorous security checks would have stopped them.

The executive order includes national security exemptions to be made on a case-by-case basis. The President reserves the option to ban the entry of nationals from additional countries in the future based on a national security risk report written by DHS. Furthermore, the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security can recommend visa bans for nationals from additional countries at any time.

In addition to the visa restrictions above, Trump's executive order further cuts the refugee program to 50,000 annually, indefinitely blocks all refugees from Syria, and suspends all refugee admissions for 120 days. This is a response to a phantom menace. From 1975 to the end of 2015, 20 refugees have been convicted of attempting or committing terrorism on U.S. soil, and only three Americans have been killed in attacks committed by refugees—all in the 1970s. Zero Americans have been killed by Syrian refugees in a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. The annual chance of an American dying in a terrorist attack committed by a refugee is one in 3.6 billion. The other 17 convictions have mainly been for aiding or attempting to join foreign terrorists.

President Trump tweeted earlier this week that executive orders were intended to improve national security by reducing the terrorist threat. However, a rational evaluation of national security threats is not the basis for Trump's orders, as the risk is fairly small but the cost is great. The measures taken here will have virtually no effect on improving U.S. national security.

Trump's Visa Ban Order: The View From A Worried Middle East

By Ladane Nasseri And Zainab Fattah

Bloomberg News, January 28, 2017

With the stroke of a pen, Donald Trump barred most citizens from seven mainly Muslim Mideast and East African nations from entering the U.S. While the latest executive order of his week-old presidency delivers on a campaign pledge to strengthen America's borders, it was denounced in advance by human-rights groups as an attack on some of the world's most vulnerable people, and will alarm many in the Islamic world.

Under the order – which also placed a 120-day ban on virtually all refugee admissions – nationals from Iran, Iraq, Libya, Syria, Yemen, Sudan and Somalia won't be able to enter the U.S. for at least 90 days while officials determine what information is needed from other countries to safely admit visitors. While the order doesn't list the countries, it points to laws that cover those seven, which were provided by the White House. Most of the countries are home to conflict or Islamist insurgency, while the U.S. has sanctioned Iran for sponsoring terrorism. So, what's at stake?

'Fears Confirmed'

Above all, the move will "confirm the fears many had of Trump escalating tensions with the Muslim world," said Ibrahim Fraihat, a professor of conflict resolution at the Doha Institute. With this act, it's clear Trump intends to deliver on pledges that many in the region had hoped to dismiss as campaign rhetoric, he said. That means other stated intentions – including the incendiary idea of moving the U.S. embassy in Israel to disputed Jerusalem from Tel Aviv – can't be brushed off, Fraihat said.

Less Cooperation on Security

In an interview, Trump said he wanted to keep out people intent on carrying out "tremendous destruction" in the U.S. But the executive order is likely to do "a very poor job" of helping to counter terrorism, said Amir Handjani, a senior non-resident fellow at the Atlantic Council based in Dubai. It's more likely to "hurt cooperation on terrorism rather than enhancing it," he said. "If these countries feel that the U.S. government is shutting their citizens out, they have fewer incentives to collaborate."

In a briefing published Jan. 27, security analysts at The Soufan Group noted that no major terrorist plot or attack in the U.S. since 2001 has involved "a perpetrator or plotter from six of the seven countries listed in the ban." A Somali immigrant wounded 10 people in September knife attack at a Minnesota mall that was claimed by Islamic State, it said.

Extremists will use the ban as a recruiting tool, said Fraihat in Doha. It provides "just the right message" to bolster their argument that the U.S. is hostile to all Muslims, he said.

Blanket Ban

Citizens of Middle Eastern and African nations applying for a U.S. visa already face some of the most stringent documentation requirements. But that's very different from a "blanket ban," said Handjani. It will be perceived as "very un-American because you are discriminating against people based on country of origin and religion," he said. Relatives of U.S. citizens, students, academics, businessmen and those seeking medical care will be shut out for now. In 2015, the last year for which full official data is available online, citizens of the seven nations were granted a total of 89,387 non-immigrant and immigrant visas.

The order bans entry of "aliens" from the nations, leaving room for strict interpretation, said the National Iranian American Council, a Washington-based advocacy and civil rights group. If the Trump administration takes a broad interpretation of this order, U.S. permanent resident aliens and dual nationals who aren't U.S. citizens and holding a passport from one of these countries may be prevented from entering or re-entering the U.S., it said in a report.

Foes

Iran's inclusion comes at a sensitive time for the Islamic Republic. Trump and leading members of his cabinet oppose the 2015 nuclear deal that lifted sanctions on Iran in return for curbs on its nuclear program. And with Iran holding a presidential election in May, any spike in tensions between the foes could swing support behind hardline critics of President Hassan Rouhani.

Iranian officials say they'll reserve judgment on Trump until he rolls out policies. So the visa ban may come to be seen as "sending the first signal" as to how the new administration will treat Iran, said Handjani. It's likely to be interpreted as a provocation and "a backdoor way" to pressure the Iranian government, he said. The order "certainly doesn't do anything to convince Iranians that the Trump administration has any interest in reducing tensions with Iran," said Trita Parsi, author of the forthcoming book "Losing an Enemy – Obama, Iran and the Triumph of Diplomacy," and president of the National Iranian American Council. It "will add fuel to arguments of Iranian hardliners" who will point to Iran's compromise as part of the nuclear accord and "say 'look what it generated: this extremely negative response against Iranian people'."

And Friends

U.S. allies in the Middle East mostly escaped being covered by the order, with the exception of Iraq, a nation that has probably suffered more than any other at the hands of Islamic State jihadists and is a key American military partner. Neither Saudi Arabia, 15 of whose nationals were among the 19 men who hijacked aircraft on Sept. 11, 2001, nor Egypt, which is fighting its own Islamist insurgency in Sinai, were subject to the action.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Saudi Arabia and Iran are on opposing sides in many of the region's major conflicts, such as those in Syria and Yemen. Speaking last week, Saudi Foreign Minister Adel al-Jubeir said he would work with Trump toward "containing" Iran. Saudi opposed the nuclear agreement, which has unlocked Iran's oil exports, and cut diplomatic relations.

Business Impact

There's little commerce between the U.S. and the seven nations, most of which are either at war or poor – or both. American citizens and entities are already barred from working with Iran under sanctions not removed by the 2015 accord. But Trump's order will further worry global investors considering a move into Iran but who fear running afoul of U.S. policy toward the Islamic Republic. Any investor who's risk-averse or who has significant interest in also maintaining good relations with the U.S. is going to pause and wait six months to see what happens, said a Western diplomat based in the Gulf, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Countries Where Trump Does Business Are Not Hit By New Travel Restrictions

By Rosalind S. Helderman

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

The seven nations targeted for new visitation restrictions by President Donald Trump on Friday all have something in common — they are places he does not appear to have any business interests.

The executive order he signed Friday bars all entry for the next 90 days by travelers from Syria, Iran, Iraq, Yemen, Sudan, Somalia and Libya. Excluded from the lists are a series of majority Muslim nations where the Trump Organization is active and which in some cases have also faced troublesome issues with terrorism.

According to the text of the order, the restriction applies to a series of countries that have already been excluded from programs allowing travelers to travel to the U.S. without a visa because of concerns over terrorism. Hewing closely to nations already named as terrorism concerns elsewhere in law might have allowed the White House to avoid angering some more powerful and wealthy majority Muslim allies, like Egypt.

But without divesting from his company, as bipartisan ethics experts had advised, Trump is now facing questions about whether he designed the new rules with his own business at least partly in mind.

"He needs to sell his businesses outside his family and place the assets in a blind trust, otherwise every decision he makes people are going to question if he's making the decision in the interests of the American people or his own bottom line," said Jordan Libowitz, the spokesman for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a liberal watchdog group. The group has filed a lawsuit arguing that Trump is already in violation of a constitutional provision barring federal officials from accepting payments from foreign officials.

Earlier in the week, former Obama ethics adviser Norm Eisen, the group's chairman, tweeted "WARNING: Mr. Pres. your Muslim ban excludes countries where you have business interests. That is a CONSTITUTIONAL VIOLATION. See u in court."

A White House spokeswoman did not respond to a question about the order and Trump's business on Saturday.

Trump has said he has handed management of his real estate, licensing and merchandising business over to his adult sons to avoid the perception that he is making presidential decisions to boost his own business. But he has retained ownership of the company, meaning that if it thrives during his presidency, he will personally profit.

The new executive order points to the complications that are likely to arise from the arrangement.

Among notable omissions, Trump's order makes no mention of Turkey, which has faced a series of terrorist attacks in recent months. On Wednesday, the State Department updated a travel warning for Americans visiting Turkey, noting that "an increase in anti-American rhetoric has the potential to inspire independent actors to carry out acts of violence against US citizens."

Trump has licensed his name to two luxury towers in Istanbul. A Turkish company also manufactures a line of Trump-branded home furnishings. Trump's most recent financial disclosure, filed in May when he was a presidential candidate, showed that he had earned as much as $6 million in the previous year from the deals.

Trump himself acknowledged in a December 2015 interview with Brietbart News "I have a little conflict of interest 'cause I have a major, major building in Istanbul," he said. More recently, he has insisted has no conflicts because laws making conflicts illegal do not apply to the president.

Also untouched by Friday's executive order is the United Arab Emirates, a powerful Muslim ally with whom the U.S. nevertheless has complicated relations. Trump has licensed his name to a Dubai golf resort, as well as a luxury home development and spa.

Trump has seemed particularly disinclined to divorce himself of interests in the project. Its developer, Hussain Sajwani, attended a New Year's Eve party at his Florida estate, Mar-a-Lago, where a video showed Trump singling him out for praise, calling him and his family "the most beautiful people."

Trump returned to the topic of his Dubai partnership again in mid-January, at a news conference intended to demonstrate how he was separating from his business.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"Over the weekend, I was offered $2 billion to do a deal in Dubai with a very, very, very amazing man, a great, great developer from the Middle East, Hussein Damack, a friend of mine, great guy. And I was offered $2 billion to do a deal in Dubai — a number of deals and I turned it down," Trump said then.

His point was that he was voluntarily turning aside new projects that could raise ethical questions. A lawyer for the company announced at the same event the Trump Organization will embark on no new foreign deals while Trump is in office. But the comment also served as a reminder that Trump's business, included the personal relationships he forged with wealthy partners around the world, was still very much on his mind as he entered the presidency.

The executive order makes no mention of Saudi Arabia, home of 15 of the 19 terrorists involved in the September 11 attacks. The Trump Organization had incorporated a series of limited liability companies in preparation for an attempt to build a hotel in Saudi Arabia, showing an interest in expansion in the country. The company canceled those incorporations in December, indicating that no project is moving forward.

Excluded as well is Indonesia, the world's largest majority-minority nation, where there are two large Trump-branded resorts underway, built in partnership with powerful local interests.

"To be blunt, we really don't know what to make of which motives are driving this president's decisions," said Kamal Essaheb, director of policy and advocacy for the National Immigration Law Center. "From what we could tell from his campaign and his actions since he became president, what seems to be first and foremost on his mind is his own self interest and an obsession with his brand."

Experts Question Legality Of Trump's Immigration Ban On Muslim Countries

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 28, 2017

The future of President Trump's executive order suspending immigration from seven predominantly Muslim countries may come down to a legal battle between his powers as commander in chief and discrimination limitations established by Congress.

Lawyers and protesters spent most of the day Saturday focused on immigrants who were traveling when Trump's order was issued, leaving them either detained at U.S. airports or stranded overseas.

But the legality of Trump's order will not be clear until it's argued in federal court, which could happen as early as next week, when civil rights and immigration advocacy groups begin filing their lawsuits.

Supporters of Trump's plan say he is standing on firm legal ground to ban immigrants and refugees temporarily from those countries because they pose a national security threat. Trump's order opens by citing the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and explains that the immigration suspension is necessary to give the federal government time to strengthen its vetting procedures for people coming from terror-prone countries.

"Throughout the history of this country, courts have given, for obvious reasons, the executive extraordinary latitude in making determinations associated with national security," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that advocates for lower levels of legal and illegal immigration. "And this is a national security judgement, something that courts would never want to interfere with."

Critics of Trump's plan say his national security argument is undercut by his repeated calls on the campaign trail for a "Muslim ban" and his comments Friday that he wants to prioritize the immigration of persecuted Christians over Muslims. Trump's ban also applies to everyone from Syria.

David Leopold, a Cleveland immigration attorney and past president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association, said a president clearly has a right to bar certain immigrants or groups of immigrants from entering the U.S. Trump's order cited a long-standing federal law that allows a president to bar entry to any immigrants or group of immigrants who the president deems "detrimental to the interests of the United States."

"But what the Trump administration failed to do," Leopold said, "is understand that nothing in our law justifies banning an entire religion, banning an entire nationality. He's going to have to answer how he can say that all of Syria is detrimental."

Leopold's argument rests largely on the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, which forbids discrimination against immigrants based on their "nationality, place of birth, or place of residence." The U.S. had previously used an immigration system that set a limit on the number of people who could enter the U.S. from each country, a system that heavily favored immigration from western Europe.

But that law has been set aside by presidents during national emergencies, according to Michael Hethmon, senior counsel at the Immigration Reform Law Institute, which provides legal support to legislators and politicians who want to reduce immigration.

Hethmon uses the example of President Carter, who in 1980 barred some Iranians from entering the U.S. during a crisis over 52 Americans being held hostage in Tehran. He said that case mirrors what Trump is facing now — the United States facing a large number of people in specific countries who are trying to harm the U.S.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"The court will say, 'There's a rational basis for picking these seven countries,'" Hethmon said. "They're all in the midst of civil conflict, they're all places where terrorist networks that are particularly dangerous to the U.S. exists. There are multiple reasons why refugees from these countries merit additional, or even extensive, scrutiny."

The seven are Iran, Sudan and Syria — which comprise the State Department's list of state sponsors of terrorism — plus Iraq, Libya, Somalia and Yemen.

The key for a court to understand the true intent behind Trump's order — whether it's a religious ban or a national security concern — could lie in one paragraph of his executive order. It declares that once the refugee program is reinstated, the Department of Homeland Security must prioritize refugee claims made by persecuted religious minorities.

"Whoever drafted the order, I think they thought they were being incredibly clever immunizing this from legal scrutiny," said Jens David Ohlin, an international law professor at Cornell Law School. "But they might have shot themselves in the foot with that one."

Ohlin said that one section, which he said was the only piece of the order that did not pin itself to the national security argument, may open the entire order to questions about favoring one religion over another. It also follows comments Trump made to the Christian Broadcast Service on Friday, when he said Christians had been treated unfairly under the U.S. refugee program and they needed to be prioritized in the future.

"Courts are going to be giving really serious scrutiny to that one," Ohlin said.

As legal questions continue to swirl over Trump's order, only one certainty exists. "This is the start of a wave of litigation," said Omar Jadwat, director of the ACLU's Immigrants' Rights Project.

Trump's Claim That It Is 'Very Tough' For Christian Syrians To Get To The United States

By Glenn Kessler

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

"They've been horribly treated. Do you know if you were a Christian in Syria it was impossible, at least very tough to get into the United States? If you were a Muslim you could come in, but if you were a Christian, it was almost impossible and the reason that was so unfair, everybody was persecuted in all fairness, but they were chopping off the heads of everybody but more so the Christians. And I thought it was very, very unfair."

— President Trump, interview on Christian Broadcasting Network, Jan. 27, 2017

Shortly before issuing a sweeping executive order to suspend refugee admissions for 120 days, President Trump gave an interview in which he said he wanted to give priority to Christians in Syria. (The actual order does not single out Christians, but religious minorities in countries.) He said that "if you were a Christian in Syria it was impossible, at least very tough to get into the United States."

Is this really the case? The Facts

A White House spokesman did not respond to a query about Trump's assertion, but the numbers certainly indicate that relatively few Christians have been admitted as Syrian refugees. Here's what the State Department website shows for Syrian refugees admitted in calendar year 2016:

Muslim Sunni: 15,134
Muslim Shiite: 29
Christian: 89*
Total: 15,152

Christians, in other words, represent about half of 1 percent of the refugees admitted, even though they make up about 5 percent of the Syrian population, according to the Pew Research Center.

But this is a case where figures can be misleading. Let's look at the numbers for Iraq, whose refugees register at the exact same offices in Jordan, Lebanon, Turkey and other countries maintained by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. UNHCR identifies refugees for possible admission to the United States, though the final approval and screening is done by the U.S. government.

Muslim Sunni: 5,106
Muslim Shiite: 3,342
Total: 9,950

In the case of Iraq, Christians represent 15 percent of the Iraqi refugees, even though they only make up less than 1 percent of the Iraqi population. (*correction: an earlier version of this article undercounted the number of Iraqi and Syrian Christians because many were listed as "Catholic" or another Christian faith rather than "Christian.")

The simple fact is that the reason for the disparity is unclear, though there are a number of theories. Nina Shea, who heads the Center for Religious Freedom at the Hudson Institute, says that Syrian Christians are "marginalized" in U.N. programs, especially in refugee camps. She says that many Christians are afraid to settle in camps because the camps are dominated by Muslims.

UNHCR data shows that only about 10 percent of refugees — 490,000 — are in camps, whereas nearly 4.4 million refugees are in urban and rural areas.

But Shea said that she has met with many Syrian Christian refugees who are "clamoring" to get out but can't get processed.

"I don't know how to explain this," she said. "It raises a red flag of de facto discrimination."

Still, UNHCR data indicates that relatively few of the Syrian refugees have identified themselves as Christian. In

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Syria, 1.5 percent of the 1 million refugees are Christian, in Jordan, 0.2 percent of the 655,000 refugees are Christian, in Iraq, 0.3 percent of the 228,000 refugees are Christian, and in Egypt, 0.1 percent of the 115,000 refugees are Christian. However, religion is not recorded in Turkey, where 2.7 million Syrian refugees have fled.

Chris Boian, a UNHCR spokesman, that the agency did not know why there was such a disparity between the Christian makeup of Iraqi and Syrian refugees arriving in the United States, except that the agency does not discriminate. "We believe part of it is that Syria is not Iraq," he said. "Many Syrian refugees may have the financial and social means to move without going through UNHCR."

For instance, Lebanon has a relatively large Christian population and has historically been linked to Syria.

In October 2015, Shea directly asked then-U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees António Guterres — now U.N. secretary general — during an appearance at the National Press Club about the dearth of Christian refugees from Syria. He responded by noting that the percentages were higher for Iraq, in part because he believed the experience for Christians was far worse in Iraq. He also noted that most of the Syria Christians had fled to Lebanon because of the long-standing links between the two countries.

Guterres said that Lebanon's then-Christian president had even told him: "Don't resettle Christians. They are vital to us." Guterres went on to say that the Middle East "is where Christianity was born, and to see these communities at the risk of being eradicated from that area is something I consider with horror. … [To remove Christians from] that part of the world that would be to really do an amputation in the DNA of Christianity and in the DNA of the Middle East."

To Shea, those comments indicated an unwillingness by the U.N. to let Syrian Christians move out of the region. She said it was necessary for the United States to directly interview potential refugees.

The Pinocchio Test

Trump goes too far to claim that it is "very tough" for Syrian Christians to become refugees in the United States, and that they have been "horribly treated." While it is correct that a relatively small percentage of Syrian refugees have been admitted, the Iraqi experience is exactly the opposite, even though the same U.N. agency is handling the refugee requests. The basic fact is no one understands why there is such a disparity. The president could highlight that situation without suggesting that something nefarious is going on.

Anxiety About Muslim Refugees Is Stoked Online By The Far-Right Media

By Caitlin Dickerson

New York Times, January 28, 2017

Type the word refugees into Facebook and some alarming "news" will appear about a refugee rape crisis, a refugee flesh-eating disease epidemic and a refugee-related risk of female genital mutilation — none of it true.

For the months leading up to the presidential election, and in the days since President Trump took office, ultraconservative websites like Breitbart News and Infowars have published a cycle of eye-popping stories with misleading claims about refugees. And it is beginning to influence public perception, experts say.

That shift was evident on Friday, as many Americans heralded the news that the Trump administration intended to temporarily curb all refugee resettlement and increase the vetting of Syrians.

"There really is a kind of cultural battle going on," said Cecillia Wang, the deputy legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union. "There's no question that kind of xenophobic or anti-Muslim bias is infecting our political discourse about refugees."

In speaking to pollsters about refugee resettlement, Americans tend to cite concerns about the country's national security and economic health as their biggest worries, but they have also begun to point to disease or rape, experts say.

"This is something where the fear outruns the fact by a factor of 100 to 1 or even 1,000 to 1," said William Galston, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who has tracked American sentiment about refugee resettlement over years.

Mr. Galston said the reaction to misleading coverage of refugees was reminiscent of the wave of measures introduced in state legislatures in recent years to stop the spread of Islamic law, despite scant evidence that it has been promoted anywhere. And while he doubted that alarmist stories about refugees were powerful enough to change people's minds, he said the coverage played to existing fears and pushed mere differences of opinion into hyperpartisan outrage.

"I think their opinions are being intensified because the intensification of contrary sentiments is increasing polarization," Mr. Galston said.

Outside his job as a police officer in Kansas, Okla., Mike Eason begins and ends his day with the television news — first CBS, then Fox, but never CNN, which he hates. Then, he scrolls through Facebook, where he's read stories about refugees who commit violent crimes against women.

"It's one of them Facebook things where you see Muslim men are attacking women, and stuff like that, and having no respect for them at all. I've got a real issue with that," he said. "I see story after story after story, and I don't know how true it is."

Mr. Eason said he was skeptical of stories by unfamiliar websites like American News, but he reads them anyway. He commented on one that was posted to Facebook:

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The post, which was shared 14,000 times, linked to a story about a case in which the authorities have not described the immigration status of the suspect, or said that he was a noncitizen. They have also discredited the claim that the man yelled “Allahu akbar” during the episode.

Nevertheless, the comment that Mr. Eason posted on the site, which he later said he could not remember making, garnered 87 likes. “If Muslims are taught hate by their religion,” he wrote, “then all Muslims are potential terrorists and should be treated accordingly. TRUMP will stop this kind of stuff.”

Sgt. Timothy Briggeman of the Cass County Sheriff’s Office in North Dakota, which is investigating the case, said such stories and responses often appeared on social media when a person in his jurisdiction with an Arabic-sounding name is charged with a crime.

“To be honest,” he said, “it’s embarrassing and it’s disheartening when anyone with a name of such ends up in the news — the comments that get thrown around. That seems to be the No. 1 remark: ‘Send them back and get rid of them,’ and, ‘We don’t need them.’”

Worries that refugees might be radicalized have also been amplified on the internet. This story was shared at least 1,400 times:

And this one, posted by The Daily Caller, was shared more than 3,000 times, despite linking to a story with no evidence of a cover-up:

The actual number of refugees who have become extremists in the United States has been estimated at between three and 12 — out of the more than 800,000 who have resettled here since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The online stories about refugees range from outright fake news to those based on a grain of truth and then stretched out of proportion. For example, the Breitbart article about genital mutilation was based on a study that estimated that a half-million women currently living in the United States have had their genitals mutilated. But most of them were immigrants who had fled here because of such treatment in their home countries.

Mr. Eason, the police officer in Oklahoma, said that part of the challenge for him in evaluating stories on the internet is that many are written with headlines that appeal to common sense.

He pointed to the vetting of Syrian refugees, for example, which is currently under review as part of Mr. Trump’s executive order. As The New York Times has reported, the process involves dozens of layers of evaluation and can last up to two years.

But Mr. Eason has read stories that suggest the conditions in Syria are so bad that it is impossible to verify refugees’ stories, which has made him worry that no level of scrutiny will be sufficient.

“They were saying with them coming from these areas, it’s hard to vet them,” Mr. Eason said. “And it makes sense.”

Donald Trump’s Muslim Ban Is Cowardly And Dangerous

New York Times, January 28, 2017

First, reflect on the cruelty of President Trump’s decision on Friday to indefinitely suspend the resettlement of Syrian refugees and temporarily ban people from seven predominantly Muslim nations from entering the United States. It took just hours to begin witnessing the injury and suffering this ban inflicts on families that had every reason to believe they had outrun carnage and despotism in their homelands to arrive in a singularly hopeful nation.

The first casualties of this bigoted, cowardly, self-defeating policy were detained early Saturday at American airports just hours after the executive order, ludicrously titled “Protecting the Nation From Foreign Terrorist Entry Into the United States,” went into effect. It must have felt like the worst trick of fate for these refugees to hit the wall of Donald Trump’s political posturing at the very last step of a yearslong, rigorous vetting process. This ban will also disrupt the lives and careers of potentially hundreds of thousands of immigrants who have been cleared to live in America under visas or permanent residency permits.

That the order, breathtaking in scope and inflammatory in tone, was issued on Holocaust Remembrance Day spoke of the president’s callousness and indifference to history, to America’s deepest lessons about its own values.

The order lacks any logic. It invokes the attacks of Sept. 11 as a rationale, while exempting the countries of origin of all the hijackers who carried out that plot and also, perhaps not coincidentally, several countries where the Trump family does business. The document does not explicitly mention any religion, yet it sets a blatantly unconstitutional standard by excluding Muslims while giving government officials the discretion to admit people of other faiths.

The order’s language makes clear that the xenophobia and Islamophobia that permeated Mr. Trump’s campaign are to stain his presidency as well. Un-American as they are, they are now American policy. “The United States must ensure that those admitted to this country do not bear hostile attitudes toward it and its founding principles,” the order says, conveying the spurious notion that all Muslims should be considered a threat. (It further claims to spare America from people who would commit acts of violence against women and those who persecute people on the basis of race, gender or sexual orientation. A president who bragged about sexually assaulting women and a vice president who has supported policies that discriminate against gay people might well fear that standard themselves.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The unrighteousness of this new policy should be enough to prompt the courts, Congress and responsible members of Mr. Trump's cabinet to reverse it immediately. But there is an even more compelling reason: It is extremely dangerous. Extremist groups will trumpet this order to spread the notion, today more credible than ever, that the United States is at war with Islam rather than targeting terrorists. They want nothing more than a fearful, recklessly belligerent America; so, if anything, this ban will heighten their efforts to strike at Americans, to provoke yet further overreaction from a volatile and inexperienced president.

American allies in the Middle East will reasonably question why they should cooperate with, and defer to, the United States while its top officials vilify their faith. Afghans and Iraqis currently supporting American military operations would be justified in reassessing the merits of taking enormous risks for a government that is bold enough to drop bombs on their homelands but too frightened to provide a haven to their most vulnerable compatriots, and perhaps to them as well.

Republicans in Congress who remain quiet or tacitly supportive of the ban should recognize that history will remember them as cowards.

There may be no one better positioned to force a suspension of this policy than Mr. Trump's secretary of defense, Jim Mattis. Mr. Mattis was cleareyed about the dangers of a proposed Muslim ban during the election, saying that American allies were reasonably wondering if "we have lost faith in reason." He added: "This kind of thing is causing us great damage right now, and it's sending shock waves through this international system."

His silence now is alarming to all who admire his commitment to American security. Mr. Mattis and other senior government officials who know better cannot lend their names to this travesty. Doing so would do more than tarnish their professional reputations. It would make them complicit in abdicating American values and endangering their fellow citizens.

Pandering To Fear

The executive order that President Trump signed on Friday calling a temporary halt to travel to the United States from seven predominantly Muslim nations — and indefinitely blocking refugees from the world's largest humanitarian crisis, in Syria—is an affront to values upon which the nation was founded and that have made it a beacon of hope around the world. George Washington declared in 1783 that the "bosom of America is open" not only to the "opulent and respectable stranger" but also "the oppressed and persecuted." Now Mr. Trump has slammed the door on the oppressed and persecuted in a fit of irrational xenophobia.

He ordered foreign nationals from Syria, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Somalia, Yemen and Iraq be barred immediately from entry into the United States for 90 days while more rigorous visa screening is put into place. This touched off panic and chaos at airports on Saturday as people with already-issued visas were turned away from boarding flights and others detained on arrival. Among those caught in the mess and held at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York was an Iraqi who had worked for the United States in Iraq for a decade. Green card holders, already permanent residents in the United States who happened to be overseas, were told they could no longer re-enter. Untold thousands of people who have applied for visas — including translators and interpreters who have worked with U.S. forces in Iraq — were left wondering if they would ever make it to American shores.

Syria's civil war has forced about 4.8 million people to flee to neighboring countries, and 1 million are seeking asylum in Europe. Mr. Trump callously and without evidence declared that Syrian refugees are "detrimental to the interests of the United States," although in fact the relatively small number who have come to the United States have proven overwhelmingly positive. Mr. Trump's four-month ban on refugees from these predominantly Muslim nations was accompanied by an instruction to prioritize refugee claims made by religious minorities facing persecution, chiefly Christians whose communities have suffered greatly over many decades. We think there's a legitimate place in refugee policy for favoring persecuted minorities, but favoring one faith while blocking people from another is demeaning to all and runs counter to the basic tenet that the United States does not discriminate by religion.

Mr. Trump claims these seven countries might produce terrorists who "will use any means possible to enter the United States." The country that supplied 15 of the 19 hijackers in the 9/11 attacks is Saudi Arabia, which is not on Mr. Trump's list. Vigilance is always called for, but refugees to the United States are as a whole grateful and hard-working and have not resorted to terrorism. Cutting them off not only punishes the most vulnerable, but may encourage terrorist recruitment and violence.

Mr. Trump's actions pander to rage and fear of outsiders. Yet our long history shows these fears are unfounded. The diversity, experience and striving of immigrants and refugees have immeasurably strengthened the United States; outbursts of anti-alien sentiment have only weakened it.

A Sisterly 'No' To Donald Trump

By Frank Bruni

New York Times, January 28, 2017

On his first full day in office, our new president harangued the National Park Service about more flattering inauguration photos and preened in front of a memorial to real American heroes, crowing about how often he's been on the cover of Time magazine.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Before his first full week was done, he temporarily barred refugees from entering the United States, halted immigration from several predominantly Muslim countries and decreed that Christians get preference over Muslims when we let outsiders in.

I watch this and feel heartsick about America, whose most fundamental values and claim to moral leadership are at stake.

Then I talk to my friend Maya Rao and her sisters and I feel just a little bit better. I feel pride and hope.

They're precisely the kind of Americans who feel so insulted and threatened by President Trump. They're precisely the kind who make this country so special and fill me with such fierce love for it. It gave them a home and horizons they might not have found elsewhere. They treasure that enough to defend it.

A week ago Saturday they woke in New Jersey at 3:30 a.m. for a 5:30 a.m. bus. Then they traveled for four hours, to Washington and the Women's March.

Maya, 41, had never done anything like this before. Neither had her older sister, Mythili Lahiri, 44, or her younger one, Meera Oliva, 39. No national marches. No street-corner demonstrations. No hoisting of signs. No chanting of chants.

Until recently they thought it was enough to keep up with the news and cast their votes in accordance with their support of the Democratic Party. There didn't seem to be time for anything more. They have demanding careers. They have three children each. They have husbands.

An extra hour of sleep is a luxury. An extra two is a fantasy.

Then: Trump. As women, they gasped at his sexism.

As first-generation Indian-Americans, they shuddered at his quickness to demonize people of color with Asian, African or Latino ancestry.

"I feel devastated," Maya told me. "For me, the acceptance of diversity is one of the things that makes this country great. This election is destroying that. And that gets me into the street."

What we've seen from the White House in this opening stage of the Trump administration isn't encouraging. Trump's promised pivot to a presidential demeanor never happened, and apparently never will: It's outside of his skill set. It's alien to his psychology. He's all ego and spleen, with only the loosest of tethers to truth.

But we're seeing something else — something sunnier — beyond the White House: an awakening in many Americans who were trusting, complacent or distracted before. That's what the protests all around the country demonstrated, though whether they will translate into consequential action — and become an insurance policy against the damage Trump may do — isn't clear. The three sisters are trying to figure that out.

They're scared. Mythili told me that as she watches Trump and the people around him reject science, construct alternate realities and try to silence anyone who balks at that, she worries that the very idea of America is in jeopardy.

"We believe in freedom of expression," she said, meaning Americans. "We believe in facts. We believe in transparency. And what he's doing — it's a slippery slope toward a country that I don't recognize and a country that I don't want to live in."

I've known Maya for more than five years, I had a long dinner with Mythili once and I've talked repeatedly with Meera on the phone. They're ferociously smart, all three of them. They're contagiously upbeat. Maya's laugh is as long and loud as any I've heard. I crave, relish and envy it.

They grew up first in Texas, which Mythili recalled as a "brutal time." No one at her school looked like her. No one shared her family's traditions — its vegetarianism, for example. Once, for a lesson on nutrition, she and her classmates were told to keep a food diary. Her teacher looked at hers and, in front of the other kids, gasped, "You didn't eat any meat?" Then she opined that Mythili's parents were leaving her malnourished.

Later they moved to the suburbs of New York. Their mother died when they were still young. Their father pushed them to excel, wanting every opportunity for them. For college, Mythili went to Barnard and both Maya and Meera to Brown.

Mythili teaches at a private school in central New Jersey. Maya, a physician, treats economically disadvantaged patients at a Manhattan hospital. Meera is the head of marketing for a start-up near her home in the Boston suburbs.

They pay taxes at the high rate of prosperous two-income couples like theirs. They instill an ethos of achievement in their sons and daughters. They contribute to this country. They flatter it.

Trump's campaign stunned them. "Who talks that way?" Mythili said, adding that he promoted "the total objectification of people who were different than he is, this concept that there's only one definition of what an American is: this white, male, gun-toting person."

Meera's thoughts were captured in a journal about the march that she contributed to Yahoo News. She wrote this:

"I am a woman of color, a child of immigrants, a wife of a Latino man and a mother to multiethnic children. And I take the election of a man who built his campaign on anti-immigration rhetoric — while shamelessly embracing racism and misogyny — very personally."

So she took that trip to Washington — four hours down, four back — although she'd never done anything like that before. She made and carried this sign: "Women's rights are human rights." Maya's sign, befitting her work in medicine, said, "Health care is a right, not a privilege." Mythili's said, "E pluribus unum." Out of many, one.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Normally, the sisters told me, a crowd as densely packed as the one that day would have made them nervous. Not this crowd. "You would accidentally hit somebody in the head with your sign and it was always, 'No worries, it's O.K.' " Meera recalled.

Maya remembered how someone started singing "The Star-Spangled Banner" and fellow marchers joined in, whether they could carry the tune or not.

They got back to New Jersey after 10 p.m. When Meera looked at comments attached to her Yahoo posts, she was chilled:

"That many angry cows marching in the same direction is called a stampede." "Marching for Shariah law in U.S.A.: bunch of total idiots!" "If you want a free ride, move to Canada. Better yet, any brown country." "What's with the men in the march? Do they squat to pee?"

Ah, the internet.

Wanting to do what she can, Mythili recently called the offices of her state's two senators — Cory Booker and Robert Menendez — to register her opposition to two of Trump's cabinet nominees, Rex Tillerson and Betsy DeVos. She'd never done something like that before, either.

But these aren't usual times. One week in, that's even clearer than before.

President Trump, Meet My Family

By Nicholas Kristof

New York Times, January 28, 2017

This newspaper has periodically, to its shame, succumbed to the kind of xenophobic fearmongering that President Trump is now trying to make American policy.

In 1875, The Times sternly warned that too many Irish and German immigrants (like the Trumps) could "deprive Americans by birth and descent of the small share they yet retain" in New York City.

In 1941, The Times cautioned in a front-page article that European Jews desperately seeking American visas might be Nazi spies. In 1942, as Japanese-Americans were being interned, The Times cheerfully suggested that the detainees were happily undertaking an "adventure."

We make bad decisions when we fear immigrants we "otherize." That's why Americans burned Irish Catholics alive, banned Chinese for decades, denied visas to Anne Frank's family and interned Japanese-Americans. And yes, The New York Times sometimes participated in such madness.

But we will not be part of that today.

Trump signed an executive order on Friday that suspends refugee programs and targets Muslims from certain countries. It's hypocritical for Trump to be today's avatar of hostility to immigrants, since his own family suffered from anti-German sentiment and pretended to be Swedish. But I'm indignant for a more personal reason — and I'm getting to that.

Kirk W. Johnson, a former American aid official in Iraq, fears that the executive order will bar military interpreters who have bled for America and to whom we have promised entry. He told me about one interpreter, nicknamed Homeboy, who ran through fire to rescue a wounded American soldier, and then was himself shot. Homeboy survived, barely, but lost his leg — and as he recovered, a grenade was thrown at his home by insurgents angry that he had helped Americans.

After years of vetting, Homeboy was approved for a visa for interpreters who helped the United States. Does Trump really want to betray such people who risked more for America than Trump himself ever did?

Yet if fear and obliviousness have led us periodically to target refugees, there's also another thread that runs through American history. It's reflected in the welcome received by somebody I deeply admire: Wladyslaw Krzysztofowicz. And this is personal.

Raised in what was then Romania and is now Ukraine, Krzysztofowicz was jailed by the Gestapo for assisting an anti-Nazi spy for the West. His aunt was murdered in Auschwitz for similar spying, but he was freed with a bribe. When World War II was ending, he fled his home as it fell into the hands of the Soviets.

After imprisonment in a Yugoslav concentration camp, he made it to Italy and then France, but he couldn't get a work permit, and he thought that neither he nor any children he might later have would ever be fully accepted in France.

So he dreamed of traveling to America, which he had heard would be open to all. He explored a fake marriage to an American woman to get a visa, but that fell through. Finally he met an American woman working in Paris who convinced her family back in Portland, Ore., to sponsor him, along with their church, the First Presbyterian Church of Portland.

As Krzysztofowicz stood on the deck of the ship Marseille, approaching New York Harbor in 1952, a white-haired woman from Boston chatted with him and quoted the famous lines from the Statue of Liberty, "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free …." Krzysztofowicz spoke little English and didn't understand, so she wrote them down for him and handed him the paper, saying, "Keep it as a souvenir, young man."

Then as she was walking away, she corrected herself: "young American."

Krzysztofowicz kept that scrap of paper and marveled that he — a refugee who had repeatedly faced death in the Old Country for not belonging — now somehow counted as an American even before he had set foot on American soil, even before he had learned English. It was an inclusiveness that dazzled him, that kindled a love for America that he passed on to his son.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

That strand of hospitality represents the best of this country. The church sponsored Krzysztofowicz even though he wasn't a Presbyterian, even though he was Eastern European at a time when the Communist bloc posed an existential threat to America. He could have been a spy or a terrorist.

But he wasn't. After arriving in Oregon, he decided that the name Krzysztofowicz was unworkable for Americans, so he shortened it to Kristof. He was my dad.

Recently I returned to the First Presbyterian Church to thank the congregation for taking a risk and sponsoring my father, who died in 2010. And the church, I'm delighted to say, is moving to support a refugee family this year.

Mr. President, please remember: This is a country built by refugees and immigrants, your ancestors and mine. When we bar them and vilify them, we shame our own roots.

Texas Border Leaders Discuss How To Approach Trump On Security, Trade

Previously scheduled meeting took on new urgency after President Trump's executive order this week to speed construction of a wall along Mexican border

One Certainty Of Trump's Wall: Big Money

By Danielle Ivory And Julie Creswell

New York Times, January 28, 2017

It was the border wall that didn't get built.

In 2006, Boeing and a team of other companies won a federal contract to construct a wall to protect the United States border with Mexico, which stretches roughly 2,000 miles, from California to Texas.

Five years and about $1 billion later, the government threw in the towel. Costs had ballooned, and the surveillance systems suffered from technical difficulties. Nearly all of the money had been spent on just 53 miles of the border in Arizona.

The project was a loss for taxpayers. But for contractors, it was a big win.

Today, as President Trump declares his intention to move forward with plans to build a barrier along the Mexican border, many of the details remain little more than a guessing game. Does Mr. Trump intend to build miles of concrete blocks, or fencing? Could parts of the wall be virtual, using technology like cameras and sensors to monitor the border, or be manned by drones? Will Mexico, as Mr. Trump has promised repeatedly, pay for it?

There is no doubt that if the United States moves ahead with plans for an ambitious border wall — one of the biggest infrastructure projects in decades, perhaps running in the tens of billions of dollars — it will be a boon for contractors.

An examination of failed efforts from the past highlights the potential gains for companies and potential pitfalls for taxpayers. Among the possible winners are construction firms, high-tech surveillance companies and cement manufacturers including, in what would be an ironic turn, one of Mexico's largest materials companies.

"There's no question that, when the government spends money on a big project like this, companies are going to make a lot of money," said Joe Hornyak, a partner with the law firm Holland and Knight, who specializes in government contracting law. "There's no question about that."

In the past week, the Senate majority leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said Congress would move ahead with plans to build the wall, estimating that it would cost $12 billion to $15 billion.

Researchers at M.I.T. said last year that a 1,000-mile, 50-foot-high steel-and-concrete wall would run taxpayers about $40 billion.

Whether the number ends up on the low or high end of these ranges, it has already caught the eye of companies and investors eager to get a piece of the construction action, despite the myriad political and social battles that will surround it. The stocks of several construction companies and cement and concrete manufacturers jumped after the latest talk from Mr. Trump, as investors bet not only on a payday coming from a Mexican border wall but also from proposals floated for about $1 trillion in infrastructure projects.

The White House did not immediately respond to an inquiry. In 2011, when the Department of Homeland Security canceled the fence project, it said the effort was ineffective and too costly.

History would suggest that such efforts can have problematic results. Past attempts at a wall have favored companies with decades of government contracting experience. From 2007 to 2012, the federal government paid contractors more than $1.5 billion for border protection, according to a New York Times analysis of spending under the Department of Homeland Security's Secure Border Initiative.

The initiative, started in 2005, has been one of the most aggressive attempts to protect the border. An office at Customs and Border Protection was assigned to develop and construct a virtual and physical wall along the border with Mexico, to reduce illegal immigration.

The company that won the biggest contract through that office was Boeing, which is best known for building aircraft but also performs a variety of tasks for the government, making it the nation's second-largest federal contractor.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Boeing was paid more than $20 billion in contracts during the last fiscal year.

Boeing was not the only winner. The security company Wackenhut Corporation, now known as G4S Secure Solutions, received more than $119 million. I.B.M. won more than $56 million, and ManTech International, the technology company, received upward of $43 million.

The project with Boeing, though, ran into snags almost immediately. Boeing and its team had built a complicated system consisting of sensors, radar and cameras mounted on towers to help border agents find people crossing into the country illegally. But the system worked inconsistently in some rough terrain.

The project became the subject of multiple, and scathing, Government Accountability Office reports, some of which cited poor fiscal oversight. And after about $1 billion had been spent, the Obama administration canceled the project.

In recent days, Boeing's chief executive, Dennis Muilenburg, has been asked whether the company had discussed border security with the president, and whether it could harvest any information from its earlier project for the new wall. He said the company was not actively pursuing anything in that area but was open to working with the government. The company, otherwise, did not comment on its scrapped project.

There have been other attempts at a barrier that also ran into financial trouble. As a result of the various projects, hundreds of miles of wall already exist along the border, though in a form — wire mesh, chain link, sheet piling, concrete vehicle barriers, post and rails and X-shaped beams — that Mr. Trump may not have envisioned.

In 2005, one border project was harshly criticized by lawmakers after it was reported that cameras broke down frequently. In another, the Department of Homeland Security's Office of the Inspector General reported in 2011 that officials had wasted $69 million in taxpayer dollars on an effort to build border walls, including the purchase of $44 million worth of extra steel that it did not need.

In 2006, President George W. Bush signed the Secure Fence Act into law, requiring 700 miles of double-layered reinforced fencing to protect the border. The law was altered later to give the Department of Homeland Security more discretion to decide what kind of fencing was needed. Much of that wall consists of vehicle barriers, which do not stop people on foot.

None of this history seems to have tempered Mr. Trump's enthusiasm. But it comes at a time when a construction boom across much of the country has created a significant shortage of legal labor to build the wall, according to construction executives and others in Texas. Separately, a study released in 2012 estimated that half the construction workers in Texas were undocumented workers. Which means that many of the laborers on the wall could be illegal immigrants.

"If this wall gets built in Texas, there is a high likelihood that a significant bit of the work force will be undocumented," said Jose P. Garza, the executive director of the Workers Defense Project, which supports low-income workers.

In another twist, money may flow to Mexicans or Mexican companies. Analysts say it is basically cost prohibitive to ship heavy rock or concrete more than 70 miles, or cement more than several hundred miles. That means manufacturers closest to the border may prove to be the most economical. That could be a big win for Cemex, Mexico's largest cement manufacturer, which has a United States-based subsidiary that could bid for the project and several plants dotting the border, analysts note. The company could also potentially receive hard-to-trace subcontracts that even government agencies sometimes have a difficult time tracking.

Also, the government already gives preferences to contractors that supply American-made construction materials when it awards such contracts, said Mr. Hornyak, but for certain large construction projects, the Trade Agreements Act waives requirements for materials made in countries that have entered into trade agreements with the United States.

So, Mr. Hornyak added, the president would most likely need Congress to change the law if he wanted to dictate that agencies, for instance, buy only American-made cement.

All of which means that, in an almost subversive inversion of the running debate over who will pay for what, the United States could ultimately wind up paying Mexican citizens and Mexican-owned businesses to construct the wall.

An infrastructure build-out could also increase the cost of cement and other materials, say analysts. Currently, the United States is operating at 90 percent of its capacity levels, estimates Garik Shmois, an analyst at Longbow Research in Independence, Ohio. "We're going to be effectively sold out by 2018, based on current projects," Mr. Shmois said. "So any additional period of growth, such as an infrastructure cycle, will put upward pressure on prices."

That is good news for cement and materials companies with significant operations in the United States, including Vulcan Materials, Martin Marietta Materials and German-based HeidelbergCement Group, as well as Mexico's Cemex and Grupo Cementos de Chihuahua.

Companies that specialize in surveillance technology or even "virtual" barriers could also benefit. Elbit Systems of America, whose parent company is based in Israel, won a contract in 2014 with Customs and Border Protection to build a set of towers with radar and cameras covering 170 to 200 miles along the Arizona border. When the radar detects movement, cameras zoom in and send images to command centers.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000326

"When looking at the border, there is not a one-size-fits-all approach," said Gordon Kesting, vice president for homeland security solutions for Elbit Systems of America. "But if you look at the costs associated with some of the approaches, they are quite different. There is a discussion to be had on the most effective and efficient use of taxpayer dollars."

Miami Mayors Chide Gimenez Over County Immigration Detentions

By Patricia Mazzei

Miami Herald, January 28, 2017

The current and former mayors of the city of Miami — a Republican and a Democrat, respectively — publicly chided Miami-Dade Mayor Carlos Gimenez for directing county jails to comply with federal immigration detention requests following President Donald Trump's crackdown on "sanctuary" jurisdictions for immigrants in the country illegally.

Mayor Tomás Regalado tweeted Friday night that he's "disappointed" by Gimenez's Thursday decision. Regalado also seemed to indicate city cops have no interest in acting as immigration deputies — something Gimenez insists the county won't be doing either, even as it subsidizes federal detentions. The city doesn't manage any jails of its own.

"@MiamiPD job is to protect and serve the residents of the @CityofMiami," Regalado wrote. "I am disappointed with the decision of the County."

Several Twitter users, perhaps unaware that the county and city are separate jurisdictions, had apparently confused Regalado with Gimenez, and Regalado responded to some of them as well.

"I am an immigrant," Regalado wrote to one person. "The City of Miami will not comply. However Miami Dade County is a whole different government."

Though both Republicans, Regalado and Gimenez have been at odds politically for decades, most recently when Regalado's daughter ran last year against Gimenez. When big-city mayors urged then-President-elect Trump last month to protect "DREAMers," immigrants brought into the country illegally as children, Regalado was quick to offer his support. Gimenez took longer to say he backed President Barack Obama's program to protect DREAMers from deportation.

Separately, former Miami Mayor Manny Diaz wrote in a pointed Miami Herald op-ed published Saturday that Gimenez, who is his friend, acted too hastily, without seeking enough legal guidance about Trump's executive order.

"While other mayors have taken an approach that protects their communities, Mayor Gimenez has rushed into action to please the president, betraying our community's long history of welcoming immigrants," wrote Diaz, a lawyer.

He argued that Miami-Dade, which notifies the feds of all of the people it arrests and is willing to detain them as long as Immigration and Customs Enforcement defrays the expense, already complied with Trump's order.

"When the president tells cities to obey him or face his wrath, it is the mayor's duty to at least question him," Diaz wrote. "Democracy is not the president saying jump, and Mayor Gimenez asking how high."

Both Diaz and Regalado weighed in after angry protesters demonstrated outside County Hall on Friday, and deluged Gimenez's office with phone calls and emails opposing his directive.

All three mayors — Diaz, Gimenez and Regalado — were born in Cuba.

Reactions from other local politicians requested by the Herald were either muted or generally divided along party lines.

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, a Florida Republican, praised Gimenez for making "the right decision." U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Miami Republican, called unfunded mandates — like requiring municipalities to detain inmates for longer without paying for it — "an evasion of responsibility by the federal government" but said local governments are now on notice and she supports withholding funds from them if they "choose to ignore federal law." U.S. Rep. Carlos Curbelo, also a Miami Republican, warned Trump's policy "focuses on a symptom, not one of the root causes of our flawed immigration system, and has the potential of undermining the work of law enforcement officials investigating serious crimes in urban areas."

U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat; U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, a Miami Republican, and U.S. Rep. Frederica Wilson, a Miami Gardens Democrat, did not respond to requests for comment.

Two Republicans on the county commission, Chairman Esteban "Steve" Bovo and Joe Martinez, sided with Gimenez. Two Democrats, Daniella Levine Cava and Jean Monestime, questioned — but only mildly — Gimenez's quick decision. Other commissioners did not respond.

The biggest denunciation came from U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Weston, whose Broward County-based district dips into northeast Miami-Dade.

"The only way to deal with a bully is to confront him," she said in a statement. "We need to stand with local officials who should oppose Donald Trump's intimidating executive order that threatens to strip federal funding from sanctuary cities and counties. This ham-fisted approach will only spread mass anxiety into communities throughout Florida and the country, and split up countless families who are our friends, coworkers and neighbors."

Miami Herald staff writer Douglas Hanks contributed to this report.

Trump Orders Joint Chiefs To Draft ISIS Strategy, Restructuring Of Security Council

By Philip Rucker And Missy Ryan

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

President Trump signed three executive orders on Saturday afternoon, including one directing the Joint Chiefs of Staff to draft a plan to destroy the Islamic State and another formalizing new lobbying restrictions on administration officials.

One of Trump's directives orders the Joint Chiefs to submit a strategy within 30 days to defeat the Islamic State, signaling that the new president hopes to make good on his campaign promise to more aggressively confront global terrorism than his predecessor.

"I think it's going to be very successful," Trump said. "That's big stuff."

Both Trump and his new defense secretary, retired Marine Gen. James Mattis, have expressed a desire to expedite an end to the battle against the Islamic State. Iraqi forces, backed by U.S. air power and American advisers, have cleared half of the city of Mosul, but they have taken heavy losses and could require additional outside support. In Syria, the United States is struggling to recruit sufficient Arab fighters to recapture the city of Raqqa, an offensive that American officials hope can begin within several months.

Even before Saturday's order, military officials had been at work developing a series of potential actions for Mattis and Trump's entire national security team to consider. Those include potentially deploying additional advisers to Iraq and Syria, allowing U.S. military personnel to accompany local forces closer to the front lines, and delegating greater decision-making power to field commanders.

Changes to the existing campaign are expected to be modest adjustments to the existing strategy rather than any radical departure. How far the new measures go "would depend upon the political risk that the president is willing to take when we do certain things that could exacerbate things with Russia or Turkey or the PMF," one defense official said, referring to Iranian-backed militias that have played an important role in fighting the Islamic State in Iraq.

U.S. ties with Turkey are already strained in Syria over U.S. support to Kurdish fighters there, and any move to expand that support is sure to inflame existing tensions.

The proposals will seek to ensure that commanders in the field "have the wherewithal and the leeway to do what they have to do to successfully prosecute the campaign," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss internal deliberations.

But employing more combat power may come with serious drawbacks, including risking additional American lives and adding to the already significant cost of military operations overseas.

Trump also signed an executive order restructuring the National Security Council and streamlining procedures in a way that the White House believes would be more adaptive to modern threats.

Trump said that the change would bring "a lot of efficiency and, I think, a lot of additional safety."

"People have talked about doing this for a long time," he said. "Like, many years."

The third executive order institutes new lobbying rules for administration officials. It stipulates that administration officials can not register as lobbyists for a full five years after leaving the government — and can never lobby on behalf of a foreign government. The lobbying rules are in keeping with Trump's campaign promise to "drain the swamp."

"Most of the people standing behind me won't be able to go to work or do anything adverse to our wonderful country," Trump said, as the aides standing around his desk in the Oval Office laughed.

As a small group of reporters were leaving the Oval Office, someone shouted out a question about the president's executive order signed Friday that temporarily blocks the arrival of refugees and immigrants from seven countries that are predominantly Muslim.

"It's not a Muslim ban, but we were totally prepared," Trump said. "It's working out very nicely. You see it at the airports, you see it all over. It's working out very nicely, and we're going to have a very, very strict ban and we're going to have extreme vetting, which we should have had in this country for many years."

It wasn't immediately clear on Saturday what effect the Trump administration's executive order halting entry of migrants and green card holders from Iraq and other Muslim-majority nations would have on the U.S. partnership with the Iraqi government in the battle against the Islamic State. Iraqi lawmakers have asked the country's Foreign Ministry to explain how the measure will affect Iraq.

How An American Ended Up Accused Of Aiding ISIS With Gift Cards

By Eric Lichtblau

New York Times, January 28, 2017

The F.B.I. had a job offer for Nick Young, a veteran Washington transit officer: Become an undercover informant for the bureau and gather information at local mosques on fellow Muslims who might pose a terrorism threat.

The clandestine work would be "a lot sexier" than his current job, Mr. Young remembered an agent named Ryan telling him. And it could pay him a lot of money if the intelligence was good.

Mr. Young turned him down. But it would not be the last time he would see the F.B.I. agent.

Last August, five years later, Mr. Young was summoned to the headquarters of the transit agency, Metro, where Ryan and other agents were waiting for him. "You probably don't recognize me, do you?" Ryan, whose beard was now thicker, asked him. "Oh, I recognize you," Mr. Young said. This time, the agent handcuffed Mr. Young on a charge of supporting the Islamic State — a case built, in a twist, by an informant who posed as a would-be terrorist fighter.

The prosecution of Mr. Young, the only law enforcement officer among more than 100 Americans who have been accused of helping the Islamic State, offers a revealing look at the F.B.I.'s shadowy cat-and-mouse efforts to identify possible Islamic extremists. President Trump has vowed to intensify the effort as part of a campaign to "annihilate" the militant group.

Mr. Young's case also poses a challenge to the F.B.I.'s expanding use of undercover operations to identify Islamic State sympathizers inside the United States who might travel overseas to help the terrorist group or commit "lone wolf" attacks at home. His lawyer claims that the F.B.I. entrapped him, with undercover operatives popping in and out of his life for at least six years.

To law enforcement officials, however, Mr. Young represents one of their worst fears: a longtime officer, with access to sensitive facilities, who they suspect was "radicalized" to support Islamic extremism.

He is charged with providing "material support" to the Islamic State, in the form of $245 worth of Google Play gift cards. The authorities say he gave the gift cards to a Muslim friend named Mo — in reality, an undercover informant — to support recruitment for the terrorist group.

Before now, very few American suspects linked to the Islamic State have spoken out. But in three and a half hours of interviews from jail, Mr. Young, a convert to Islam, portrayed himself and many other American Muslims under investigation as victims of religious persecution. He accused an "overzealous" F.B.I. of "manufacturing" the case.

"I know for sure I wouldn't have been targeted if I was an evangelic Christian or a Sikh or a Hindu or something," said Mr. Young, 37.

"I'm not a terrorist," he added. "Seeing these horrible allegations and the way they're trying to paint me, it's just a nightmare."

Officials at the F.B.I. and the Justice Department declined to comment on the case. In general, the F.B.I. said in a statement, the investigative techniques used in such national security cases "are subject to vigorous oversight and require us to use the least intrusive means possible."

The F.B.I. has moved aggressively since the rise of the Islamic State in 2014 to identify suspected extremist supporters inside the United States, opening hundreds of investigations and generating convictions from Brooklyn to Southern California, often against young Muslim men.

Mr. Trump has declared that the country must do more to confront what he calls "radical Islamic terrorism," including the possibility of expanding surveillance and intelligence operations, creating a "registry" of American Muslims, and reviving torture as an interrogation technique.

While Mr. Trump has sent mixed signals on some of those proposals, they have worried some civil liberties advocates, who say they are eager to see whether the Justice Department and the F.B.I. seek to expand their investigative powers still further in domestic terrorism cases.

Mr. Young sees himself as a pawn in that broader fight.

He acknowledges holding passionate views about the Middle East and the "slaughter" of Syrians by the government of President Bashar al-Assad. On breaks from the transit agency, Mr. Young traveled to Libya twice in 2011 with body armor to join rebels fighting the Qaddafi regime.

"I didn't kill anyone while I was there," he said, laughing, but "I got shot at a lot."

He insisted that he had never supported terrorists. He plans to take the witness stand at his trial, an unusual tactic for a terrorism suspect. "Nick doesn't have anything to hide," said Nicholas D. Smith, one of his lawyers.

As he waits for his trial date, he sits in a rural jail in Warsaw, Va., reading science fiction occasionally, with "The Jerry Springer Show" sometimes playing on a television in the background. "My brain's turning to mush," he said.

He said the jail had denied him access to Muslim prayer sessions. But the conditions are far better, he added, than the solitary confinement he was placed in for 23 hours a day for months after his arrest. That ordeal, he said, has caused lingering panic attacks and other problems.

Unlike the bulk of the Americans charged with supporting the Islamic State, Mr. Young is not accused of plotting violence or trying to travel to the Middle East to fight with the group.

He said he was under investigation for so long, it was almost inevitable that the authorities would find a way to charge him. “At the end of the day, the crime I’m being accused of — a crime of sending gift cards — it would be laughable if it wasn’t really happening,” Mr. Young said.

He declined to explain the gift cards, citing a pretrial order that restricts what he can say about documents in the case. But he said his explanation would come out at his trial.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, dozens of terrorism defendants caught in undercover stings have claimed in court that they were illegally entrapped into saying or doing incriminating things. None have succeeded.

Judges have given the Justice Department wide latitude in using undercover stings in terrorism cases. “You almost need a perfect case” to prove entrapment, said Seamus Hughes, a terrorism expert at George Washington University’s Program on Extremism, “and that’s difficult to find.”

Still, several legal analysts said Mr. Young might have a legitimate shot, because of the unusual elements of the F.B.I.’s yearslong undercover investigation. They point out that even an obstruction-of-justice charge that Mr. Young faces is based on his statements to agents about a fictional F.B.I. investigation into the whereabouts of a would-be Islamic State fighter who never existed.

Mr. Young apparently first came onto the F.B.I.’s radar around 2010 because he knew a fellow student at George Mason University, Zachary A. Chesser, who, like him, was a white convert to Islam from Northern Virginia and attended the same mosque.

The F.B.I. interviewed Mr. Young that year as part of an investigation into Mr. Chesser, who ultimately pleaded guilty to terrorism-related charges after he was accused of threatening the creators of “South Park” over the show’s depiction of the Prophet Muhammad.

Mr. Young does not appear to have been an F.B.I. target at the time, even as undercover informants began giving the bureau reports about the activities of him and some of his associates.

He continued working as an armed officer patrolling Washington-area subways and bus lines. He said F.B.I. agents — Ryan and a second agent — had met with him twice in 2011 to recruit him as an informant.

Mr. Young said he found the idea of becoming an informant distasteful. The F.B.I. said in a court affidavit that he had used stronger language in a conversation with one of the bureau’s undercover informants, saying that if he were ever betrayed by one, “that person’s head would be in a cinder block” at the bottom of a lake.

Based on wiretaps and statements from informants, the F.B.I. reported that Mr. Young had made a number of other incendiary and perhaps even threatening comments over the years about Muslim informants, F.B.I. investigators and “kaffirs” — or nonbelievers.

Mr. Young acknowledged that he could have used “a little self-editing” in some of his private remarks. But he said he had never meant them to be taken literally. “Everyone’s capable of saying stupid, blustery things,” said Mr. Smith, his lawyer.

Some F.B.I. officials pressed to bring criminal charges against Mr. Young years ago, but the Justice Department rebuffed them because of an apparent lack of evidence that he was involved in supporting terrorism, according to law enforcement officials.

It was not until 2014 that Mr. Young crossed the line into supporting terrorism, the Justice Department now alleges. That was when he first met Mo, a Middle Easterner who said he was a military reservist, at a mosque where he prayed. Mr. Young said he had suspected early on that Mo might be an informant because of his strange mannerisms.

But his concerns eased, and the two became friends, meeting at a Starbucks or elsewhere. Mo later told Mr. Young that he was thinking of traveling to Syria to join the Islamic State, prosecutors said.

While Mr. Young sometimes appeared to offer Mo advice on how best to avoid government scrutiny if he went to the Middle East, he also told him at times that he did not need to join the terrorist group — at least not then, according to the F.B.I.’s account.

“There is no one with a gun to your head that is counting down,” he told Mo in a conversation recorded in October 2014.

Such statements, said Mr. Smith, his lawyer, show that “the government is really grasping at straws here.” Prosecutors are acting on “really more of a hunch that he might commit crimes in the future,” he said, “and they can’t prove it.”

Hackers Hit D.C. Police Closed-circuit Camera Network, City Officials Disclose

By Clarence Williams

Washington Post, January 27, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Hackers infected 70 percent of storage devices that record data from D.C. police surveillance cameras eight days before President Trump's inauguration, forcing major citywide reinstallation efforts, according to the police and the city's technology office.

City officials said ransomware left police cameras unable to record between Jan. 12 and Jan. 15. The cyberattack affected 123 of 187 network video recorders in a closed-circuit TV system for public spaces across the city, the officials said late Friday.

Brian Ebert, a Secret Service official, said the safety of the public or protectees was never jeopardized.

Archana Vemulapalli, the city's Chief Technology Officer, said the city paid no ransom and resolved the problem by taking the devices offline, removing all software and restarting the system at each site.

An investigation into the source of the hack continues, said Vemulapalli, who said the intrusion was confined to the police CCTV cameras that monitor public areas and did not extend deeper into D.C. computer networks.

Ransomware is malware that is said to be proliferating. It infects computers, often when users click on a link or open an attachment in an email. It then encrypts files or otherwise locks users out until they pay.

The D.C. hack appeared to be an extortion effort that"was localized" and did not affect criminal investigations, city officials said.

On Jan. 12 D.C. police noticed four camera sites were not functioning properly and told OCTO. The technology office found two forms of ransomware in the four recording devices and launched a citywide sweep of the network where they found more infected sites, said Vemulapalli.

The network video recorders are connected to as many as four cameras at each site, she said.

"There was no access from these devices into our environment," Vemulapalli said.

Interim Police Chief Peter Newsham said that police worked with OCTO but that the incident was limited to about 48 hours He said there was "no significant impact" overall.

City officials declined to say who they suspected in the attack.

US No Longer Has Geography As Defense, Ally In Cybercombat

By Tami Abdollah

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – The United States has long relied on its borders and superior military might to protect against and deter foreign aggressors. But a lack of boundaries and any rulebook in cyberspace has increased the threat and leveled the playing field today.

It's unclear how President Donald Trump, who has emphasized an "America First" approach to domestic issues, will respond to cyberspace threats, which transcend traditional borders and make it easier and cheaper than ever for foreigners to attack the U.S. Whatever the approach, it will set the tone and precedent for global policies during a critical time when the ground rules are still being written.

At a hearing this month on foreign cyberthreats, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., ran through a list of recent operations the U.S. believes was carried out by foreign countries – Russia, China, Iran and North Korea. The targets: the White House, State Department, Office of Personnel Management, Joint Chiefs of Staff, Navy, major U.S. financial institutions, a small New York dam and Sony Pictures Entertainment Inc.

"Our adversaries have reached a common conclusion, that the reward for attacking America in cyberspace outweighs the risk," McCain said.

With most of the U.S. critical infrastructure in private hands and Americans among the most connected citizens in the world, the potential attack surface for any hacker is vast and increasing. U.S. officials and lawmakers have argued that because there is no official policy on cyberwarfare, the response to any attack can be slow, politicized and ultimately ineffectual.

The U.S. took two months, after publicly accusing Russian government hackers of trying to influence the presidential election, to respond with economic sanctions and other more symbolic measures.

The reality is that the "nature of conflict has moved to the information space instead of just the physical kinetic space, and it now operates at greater scale and quicker speed," said Sean Kanuck, who served as the first U.S. national intelligence officer for cyber issues in the Office of the Director for National Intelligence.

Under the Obama administration, the U.S. proposed international cyber rules for peacetime, including that countries should not target another's critical infrastructure. But otherwise, it has maintained existing international laws and reserved the right to respond to any cyberattack.

The Trump administration is reviewing cyber policies, but it has said it will prioritize developing defensive and offensive cyber capabilities. It has also said it will work with international partners to engage in "cyberwarfare to disrupt and disable (terrorist) propaganda and recruiting."

Unlike conventional warfare, the costs in cyberspace can have rippling impacts for both the victim and attacker. Malicious software may end up spreading in an unforeseen and unplanned manner, and a hacker who gets into a single computer can cause unpredicted effects to a network.

"Look at what North Korea did to Sony or what China did to us via the OPM hack," said David Gioe, a history fellow at the Army Cyber Institute at West Point and a former intelligence officer. "You've got all of these aircraft carriers and all of this ocean, and it really doesn't matter because we're still feeling effects. They're not kinetic effects, but they're surely effects."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

More than 20 million people had their personal information compromised when the Office of Personnel Management was hacked in what the U.S. believes was a Chinese espionage operation.

"Really it's our geeks versus their geeks," Gioe said. "In the same way as single combat. It doesn't matter how good my army is or your army is, it's me versus you."

Trump's Making His Own Rules As A Diplomat, Too

By Michael Crowley

Politico, January 28, 2017

Donald Trump made his own rules as a presidential candidate, and now he's pushing ahead with global diplomacy in a similarly freewheeling fashion—with no Secretary of State yet in place and relatively little guidance from seasoned diplomatic advisers.

Trump plans to speak by phone Saturday with the leaders of Australia, France, Germany and Japan, as well as with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The calls follow his White House meeting Friday with British Prime Minister Theresa May, and a phone call with Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto. On Monday, Trump will host Jordan's King Abdullah, a crucial Arab ally.

The outreach comes despite the continued gaps in Trump's diplomatic team. For decades, presidential meetings with foreign leaders have involved copious preparation by the State Department and the White House's National Security Council which produces clear guidance to avoid surprises or misunderstandings that could trigger an international incident.

Trump is still filling vacancies, including for posts with responsibility for coordinating policy for Europe and Russia. National Security Advisor Michael Flynn, a former military intelligence officer whose background is limited to the Middle East and Afghanistan, has no traditional diplomatic experience.

The State Department is also a work in progress: Trump's nominee for Secretary of State, Rex Tillerson, isn't expected to be confirmed until Monday at the earliest. Even if he is confirmed as expected, Tillerson will need to install invaluable deputies—including new senior officials for Russia and the Middle East. The occupants of those two jobs, Victoria Nuland and Anne Patterson, resigned this month, taking a trove of institutional knowledge with them.

Even in some key parts of the State Department where new faces have arrived, confusion lingers. At the department's influential office of Policy Planning—a kind of in-house think tank traditionally led by particularly bright minds—Carnegie Mellon associate professor Kiron Skinner has been working in the director's office. But White House and State Department officials would not say whether she will be the new policy planning chief, and Skinner, a Harvard Ph.D. who has written extensively about Ronald Reagan, has had little contact with career staffers there.

The Trump team has recently unveiled the names of some incoming national security officials. On Wednesday the White House announced that Andrea Thompson, a retired Army intelligence officer, would be national security advisor to Vice President Mike Pence. Sebastian Gorka, national security editor for Breitbart News, and Victoria Coates, national security advisor to Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) will reportedly also join the national security council.

Trump's approach contrasts with the one adopted by President Barack Obama, who in 2009 retained George W. Bush's defense secretary Robert Gates. Obama also kept on Bush's top national security council official overseeing the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Douglas Lute.

One of Trump's key conduits to foreign officials is his 36-year-old son in law, Jared Kushner, who's never worked in government. Kushner sat in on his meetings Friday with May.

A White House spokesman would not provide details on the preparations for Trump's conversations with other leaders. A State Department official would say only that the department is "playing its traditional role to support the President in his engagement with foreign leaders."

A lack of seasoned support didn't prevent Trump from pulling off a seemingly smooth meeting with May. The two leaders held a cheerful joint press conference at which Trump showed relative self-restraint and sprang no surprises on the British leader.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The stakes will be higher in Trump's call with Putin, his first as president, during which the men are expected to discuss the possibility that Trump might lift some U.S. sanctions on Moscow.

Even the idea of lifting sanctions is politically explosive. On Friday, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) warned Trump that backing down on Russia would be "a reckless course" that he would seek to reverse with Congressional legislation.

The focus on Trump's Putin call has overshadowed his planned talks Saturday with French President Francois Hollande and German Chancellor Angela Merkel. Many analysts consider the German leader America's most important ally, and President Barack Obama worked assiduously to develop a strong relationship with her.

Merkel greeted Trump's election somewhat coolly, issuing a congratulatory statement that said she would cooperate with the incoming president on the basis of agreement over "values of democracy, freedom and respect for the law and the dignity of man, independent of origin, skin color, religion, gender, sexual orientation or political views."

The German chancellor is also a skeptic of Putin and will likely expect clarity from Trump about his plans for dealing with the Russian leader.

On Monday, Trump will host Jordan's King Abdullah, whom many have long considered Washington's closest friend in the Arab world—but who arrives amid politically explosive talk that Trump might seek to move the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, an act that could ignite the Palestinian population within and along Jordan's borders.

Trump Administration Holds Off On Issuing U.N. Funding Order

By Max Fisher

New York Times, January 28, 2017

The Trump administration is delaying its plans to issue two executive orders that would reduce funding to the United Nations and begin a process to review and potentially cancel certain multilateral treaties, according to current and former officials briefed on the matter.

Both draft orders were submitted to the National Security Council for approval, but the council's advisers were granted less than an hour and a half to review them, though this process normally takes weeks. Federal agencies were granted similarly brief windows for review.

Federal officials that were asked to review the documents balked at their contents, warning they required legal vetting.

The draft orders are now being withheld for a more complete review by a number of agencies, including the State Department, which is expected to begin as early as next week.

The draft order on the United Nations funding, according to copies acquired by The New York Times, called for "at least a 40 percent overall decrease" in contributions by the United States to the world body and its agencies. Much of this funding currently goes to international peacekeeping operations and other core United Nations missions. The draft order would have allowed for similar cuts to other international organizations, but it did not name them.

Some provisions in the draft order were either unclear or redundant. For example, one suggested considering cuts in funding toward the International Criminal Court, but the United States does not recognize that body or make contributions to it. Another called for the termination of funding for any United Nations agency that grants full membership to a Palestinian representative, which is already United States law.

Nikki R. Haley, the new American ambassador to the United Nations, said in comments at the United Nations headquarters on Friday, "You're going to see a change in the way we do business."

Ms. Haley added, "For those who don't have our backs, we're taking names."

President Trump expressed antipathy toward the United Nations during the campaign.

A second draft order called for establishing a process to review whether some multilateral treaties should be annulled, including current and pending treaties. The order's text excluded treaties "directly related" to extradition, trade or national security, though it is unclear which treaties would have qualified.

Experts said that permission for the reviews of treaties related to the environment — such as the Paris climate agreement — or to human rights also appeared to be intended in the draft order.

Trump, Putin Use First Formal Phone Call To Seek Better Ties

By Jake Rudnitsky

Bloomberg Politics, January 28, 2017

President Donald Trump and Russian President Vladimir Putin pledged cooperation in fighting the Islamic State, the two sides said, as the pair seek to reverse tension after Russia's invasion of Ukraine, its support for Syria, and allegations that Russian hackers sought to sway the U.S. election.

"The positive call was a significant start to improving the relationship between the United States and Russia that is in need of repair," the White House said in a statement. Putin told Trump he "sees the U.S. as a most important partner in the fight against international terrorism," according to a readout of the call from the Kremlin that described the conversation as "positive and businesslike."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The conversation, one of several Trump held with world leaders on Saturday, was the among the first formal steps in his effort to reset relations with the Kremlin, which soured under the Obama administration after Russia's invasion of Ukraine and its support for Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad in his fight against rebel groups. Trump's critics have questioned the wisdom of his calls for better ties with Putin, especially in light of the U.S. intelligence community's conclusion that Russia hacked e-mails of the Democratic National Committee in a bid to swing the November election in Trump's favor.

Trump has said he would consider easing financial penalties imposed by the U.S. over the annexation of Crimea in 2014 in exchange for Russia's support on a nuclear weapons deal or fighting terror groups like the Islamic State. Critics have argued that Russia's support of Assad has nothing to do with Islamic State fighters based there, pointing to the fact that its air war has focused on rebels around Aleppo not affiliated with the group.

'Active Joint Efforts'

Vice President Mike Pence participated in the call with Putin along with senior counselor Stephen Bannon, chief of staff Reince Priebus, national security adviser Michael Flynn and press secretary Sean Spicer. The White House said the call lasted about an hour.

"In the course of the conversation, both sides demonstrated a desire for active joint efforts to stabilize and develop Russia-American relations on a constructive, equitable and mutually beneficial basis," the Kremlin said. "The importance was underlined of restoring mutually beneficial trade and economic ties between business on both sides."

There was no mention in either readout of the wide-ranging U.S. sanctions targeting Russia's banking, energy, and defense sectors. Some were imposed via executive order by former President Barack Obama, which Trump has the power to undo quickly.

Trump downplayed the possibility of sanctions relief during a press conference on Friday, saying, "We'll see what happens. As far as the sanctions, very early to be talking about that."

Climate Accord

Also Saturday, Trump spoke with Japan's Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, French Prime Minister Francois Hollande, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel. Hollande said the sanctions on Russia must only be lifted if progress is made on the Minsk agreement aimed at bringing peace to Ukraine, according to his office.

He told Trump that "the defense of democracies requires observing fundamental principles and among these are welcoming refugees," a criticism of the president's executive order, signed Friday, that suspended refugee admissions and put a 90-day ban on admissions of immigrants from seven Muslim-majority nations including Iran, Iraq and Syria.

Hollande also warned Trump of the "economic and political consequences" of protectionism, according to his office, as the U.S. president looks to renegotiate trade agreements and potentially put a tax on imports.

NATO Alliance

In the call with Merkel, Trump agreed on the importance of the NATO alliance and the need for allies to contribute their fair share, according to readouts from both sides. The White House said they discussed Ukraine but provided no details; Merkel has previously said she wants Europe to maintain pressure on Russia over Ukraine regardless of what the U.S. decides to do.

Trump accepted Merkel's invitation to attend a Group of 20 summit in Hamburg in July, according to the readouts.

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill also warned Trump they would look to act if he rolled back the penalties on Russia.

'Reckless Course'

Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican, on Friday called on Trump to "reject such a reckless course" and remember that Putin is "a murderer and a thug who seeks to undermine American national security interests at every turn."

"If he does not, I will work with my colleagues to codify sanctions against Russia into law," McCain said.

There was no indication that Putin and Trump discussed Russian attempts to interfere in the election. The Obama administration imposed additional sanctions and expelled Russian intelligence officials from the U.S. over alleged interference. As part of a report detailing the Russian effort, both the former and current president also were briefed on an unsubstantiated dossier of salacious personal and business intelligence about Trump allegedly collected by Russian security services.

Trump has denied the allegations in the dossier, which was subsequently published by the website BuzzFeed, and the Kremlin has said it didn't spy on the president during his trips to Russia as a private citizen.

Trump Holds Calls With Putin, Leaders From Europe And Asia

By Philip Rucker And David Filipov

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

President Trump called Russian President Vladi-mir Putin on Saturday in hopes of cultivating "a great relationship," one in a series of telephone conversations with world leaders as he develops a personal rapport with the heads of several traditional U.S. allies.

Trump's conversation with Putin, which began about noon Eastern time, comes as the president faces pressure to maintain sanctions against Moscow. He is reaching out to repair the U.S.-Russian relationship, which has been badly strained by the Ukrainian crisis, the war in Syria and the conclusion by U.S. intelligence agencies that Putin ordered systematic hacking of Democratic emails to tip the presidential election in Trump's favor.

Trump spoke with Putin from behind his desk in the Oval Office, which was stacked high with papers and a glass of soda. The president was flanked by Vice President Pence, National Security Adviser Michael Flynn, White House chief of staff Reince Priebus, chief strategist Stephen K. Bannon and press secretary Sean Spicer.

Trump began the day with a call to Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe to discuss security and trade issues between the two countries and the mutual threat posed by North Korea.

"President Trump affirmed the iron-clad U.S. commitment to ensuring the security of Japan," a White House statement said. It continued, "President Trump and Prime Minister Abe said they would consult and cooperate on the threat posed by North Korea."

Trump and Abe also discussed an upcoming visit to Japan and other countries in the region by newly installed Defense Secretary James Mattis. Abe, who during Trump's transition phase became the first foreign leader to talk face-to-face with the president-elect, agreed to meet Trump during a visit to Washington on Feb. 10, according to the White House.

Trump then spoke by phone from with German Chancellor Angela Merkel. His outreach to Merkel comes after his repeated attacks on her during the campaign, during which he blasted the German policy on admitting Syrian refugees for, he said, putting German citizens in danger of terrorist attacks.

Trump is planning to speak later Saturday with French President François Hollande and Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull.

Ahead of Trump's call with Putin, leaders in Moscow expressed cautious hope that the new American leader could forge stronger ties than former president Barack Obama did.

On Saturday, Nikolai Patrushev, the influential head of the Russian Security Council, welcomed the first contact.

"We will await the results, but I believe everything will be positive," Patrushev said Saturday, according to Russia's Interfax news agency.

From Moscow's point of view, lifting the sanctions imposed by the Obama administration for interference in the presidential election and Russia's intervention in Ukraine would be a good start, as would a reduction of NATO's military presence near Russia's borders.

Washington's European allies, meanwhile, have expressed concern over whether Trump's first moves with Russia will signal a reduction of the U.S. commitment to European security.

But Trump, speaking Friday at a White House news conference with British Prime Minister Theresa May, said that it is "very early" to discuss lifting sanctions on Russia. May also stated her commitment to keep the sanctions in place until the Minsk Agreement, a plan to end the conflict in Ukraine, has been implemented. And she added that she continues to argue that position "inside the European Union."

Trump's first contact with Putin as president comes after months of speculation over the Kremlin's role in the 2016 election — starting with Trump's frequent expressions of admiration for Putin and culminating in the assessment of the U.S. intelligence community that Russia interfered in the campaign on Trump's behalf.

Trump has vehemently denied allegations that his positive view of Moscow stems from business ties or blackmail by Russian intelligence, and he has sought to portray his upbeat words about Putin as a positive.

He has consistently argued that Russia can be a strong ally instead of a strategic ally, saying the two countries could cooperate on counterterrorism in general and rolling back the Islamic State in particular, as well as countering nuclear weapon proliferation. Trump has suggested that Washington can work with Moscow on the conflicts in Syria and Ukraine and that he might be ready to negotiate down NATO's strong defensive posture on Russia's western border.

U.S. lawmakers from both parties, and others including Trump Cabinet picks, have raised alarms or at least questioned his softer approach to Russia.

But on Friday, the president expressed more tempered expectations.

"As far as, again, Putin and Russia, I don't say good, bad or indifferent," Trump said. "I don't know the gentleman. I hope we have a fantastic relationship. That's possible. And it's also possible we won't. We will see what happens. I will be representing the American people very, very strongly, very forcefully."

On a grander scale, the Kremlin seems to hope the Trump administration will relax what it sees as a policy of containment since the fall of the Soviet Union left the United States as the world's sole superpower. In the new world order outlined by Putin, Russia would have greater influence in world affairs and, from Moscow's point of view, feel more secure at home.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But Moscow has consistently cautioned about "excessive optimism" over what Trump's presidency will mean for Russia, and Putin spokesman Dmitry Peskov stayed on script Friday. "One can hardly expect substantive contacts on the entire range of affairs from this call," he told reporters. "Let us wait and see. Let us be patient."

Moscow's establishment has welcomed Trump as a pragmatist who will not try to enforce American values on the rest of the world.

"He is a businessman. He is a pragmatic person," Andrei Norkin, co-host of a popular Russian political talk show, said this week. "I hope that his attitude to foreign policy will be like to some sort of business deal. People who will work with him will be telling him 'Mr. President, we are taking a risk here,' and he will agree."

Trump And Putin Have First Official Phone Conversation Amid European Anxiety About Future Relations

By Christi Parsons And Tracy Wilkinson, Contact Reporters

Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2017

President Trump made a flurry of phone calls to world leaders Saturday as he began shaping his new administration's foreign policy, but none was as anxiously anticipated as the first official president-to-president contact with Russia's Vladimir Putin.

As his top aides looked on, Trump sat in the Oval Office and spoke with the Russian president on his desk phone, at one point peering out the windows at the White House journalists watching from across the Rose Garden.

The pair discussed combating terrorism, confronting Islamic State militants, the crisis in Ukraine and the Iranian nuclear deal, according to a statement from the Kremlin. Moscow said the topic of easing U.S. sanctions against Russia over its 2014 annexation of Crimea did not come up.

And the men agreed to a set a possible date and venue for a personal meeting, and vowed to maintain "regular personal contacts," the Kremlin statement said.

In its own statement after the one-hour phone call, the White House said, "The positive call was a significant start to improving the relationship between the United States and Russia that is in need of repair. Both President Trump and President Putin are hopeful that after today's call the two sides can move quickly to tackle terrorism and other important issues of mutual concern."

Trump's budding relationship with Putin is certain to be one of the most closely watched of his administration, both at home and around the world.

Trump has alarmed European leaders and U.S. lawmakers from both parties with his praise and unusually friendly overtures toward the Russian leader, whom much of the world considers an authoritarian who has taken increasingly aggressive actions in Europe and the Middle East.

And Trump's oft-stated desire to improve relations with Russia comes despite the recent conclusion by American intelligence agencies that Russia hacked into the email systems of U.S. political organizations last year in an audacious bid to interfere with the presidential election and help Trump.

Trump said Friday that having Russia as an ally "would be an asset." He says Russia can help the U.S. defeat Islamic State militants in Syria, even though Putin's priority so far in Syria has not been attacking Islamic State but supporting his ally Syrian President Bashar Assad, who is opposed by the U.S.

Trump's pick for secretary of State, America's top diplomat, has further cemented the concerns. Rex Tillerson, the former chief executive officer of Exxon Mobil, has acknowledged a close relationship with Putin, honed through years of multibillion-dollar deals for oil exploration and drilling in Russia.

Both Trump and Tillerson have been less than enthusiastic about economic sanctions imposed on Russia after Putin invaded Ukraine and annexed the Crimean peninsula in 2014. Trump even suggested the U.S. could lift the sanctions if Russia agreed to compromise on nuclear arms, an unrelated matter.

Alexei Pushkov, a Russian senator and former chairman of the parliamentary foreign relations committee, said Saturday that the phone call marked the start of a new, closer U.S.-Russia relationship.

"The Trump-Putin conversation will give a new beginning to the fight against [Islamic State], a solution of the crises in Syria, Ukraine. Merkel only has old solutions," he tweeted, referring to German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Trump supporters said that his outreach toward Russia was intended to curb Putin's aggressive behavior.

"I do think they are going into this with a general negotiating tactic: Offer Russia a chance to back off and not be antagonistic," said James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow at the conservative think tank Heritage Foundation, who briefed Trump on foreign affairs during the transition. "That is different from placating [Putin] and giving him whatever he wants."

In addition to the chat with Putin, Trump made phone calls Saturday to four other world leaders: Merkel, French President Francois Hollande, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and Australian Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull.

And the president kept up his frenetic pace of executive action by signing new directives that put his own imprint on the national security apparatus.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Trump signed executive actions to reorganize the National Security Council and to direct the joint chiefs of staff to present him with a plan to defeat Islamic State.

He also issued a five-year ban preventing people who work for him from lobbying his administration after they leave it.

The action came right on the heels of an executive order Friday closing U.S. borders to refugees from around the world and temporarily halting immigration from several mostly Muslim countries.

Germany's Merkel, Trump Agree On Importance Of NATO In Call

By Frank Jordans

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

BERLIN (AP) – German Chancellor Angela Merkel and U.S. President Donald Trump discussed conflicts in the Middle East and Ukraine on Saturday and agreed on the importance of NATO during their first call since Trump's inauguration, according to joint statement by Merkel's office.

The two leaders had an "extensive phone conversation" in which they also talked about relations with Russia, said Merkel's spokesman Steffen Seibert.

"They expressed their intention to further deepen the already excellent bilateral relations in the coming years," Seibert said.

On NATO, both agreed on the "fundamental importance that the NATO alliance has for trans-Atlantic relations" and the need for all members to pay their fair share. Trump has repeatedly said some U.S. allies don't spend enough on their militaries.

In the joint statement, there was no mention of refugees, not even of Trump's move on Friday banning refugees from several Muslim-majority countries from entering the United States. That move drew sharp criticism Saturday from French President Francois Hollande, Germany's European Union ally, among others.

Trump had severely criticized Merkel during his election campaign, claiming she was "ruining" Germany by allowing hundreds of thousands of asylum-seekers into the country.

In turn, Merkel had raised eyebrows after Trump's victory by insisting that the basis for cooperation between Berlin and Washington should be "democracy, freedom and human rights worldwide, and to strive for an open and liberal world order."

Seibert said Trump accepted Merkel's invitation to attend the G-20 meeting in Hamburg, Germany, in July. Trump also said he looked forward to welcoming Merkel in Washington "soon," according to the statement.

It was the second time Trump and Merkel have spoken by phone. They first spoke when the German chancellor called Trump shortly after the election to congratulate him on his victory.

Trump To Honor Pacific Island Refugee Deal With Australia

By Edward Johnson

Bloomberg News, January 29, 2017

U.S. President Donald Trump has vowed to uphold an agreement with Australia to resettle asylum seekers held in

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Pacific island camps, an Australian government official said Sunday.

Trump made the commitment during a 25-minute phone conversation with Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull, according to the official, who asked not to be identified as there has been no public announcement.

About 1,600 asylum seekers who tried to reach Australia by boat are being detained on Manus Island and Nauru, with many potentially eligible to be resettled in the U.S. under an agreement reached last year with the Obama administration.

The deal appeared in jeopardy when Trump on Friday signed an executive order indefinitely banning admission of people fleeing Syria, temporarily freezing the entry of other refugees and prohibiting entry by people from seven majority-Muslim nations for 90 days.

Turnbull told reporters on Saturday, before his phone hook-up with the Oval Office, he was "very confident" the agreement would be upheld. The prime minister has not spoken publicly since the call with Trump.

The White House said in an earlier statement that Trump and Turnbull "emphasized the enduring strength and closeness of the U.S.-Australia relationship that is critical for peace, stability, and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific region and globally." The White House didn't immediately respond to a late-night request for comment on the refugee deal with Australia.

The two leaders committed to making the U.S.-Australia alliance even stronger, according to the Australian official. They discussed their shared objective to defeating Islamic State and tackling global instability, including in the Asia-Pacific region. They also acknowledged their common interest in preventing irregular and illegal migration, the official said.

Australia's foreign ministry said the embassy in Washington was "engaging" with U.S. officials on what Trump's executive order meant for Australian dual nationals from Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen.

The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade "has not received any requests for consular assistance from Australians unable to board transport to the United States," it said in an e-mailed statement Sunday.

Inside The Contentious Israeli Settlement That Counts Trump As A Donor

By Loveday Morris And Ruth Eglash

Washington Post, January 29, 2017

In a modern building of beige and black stone, hundreds of Jewish students pore over religious texts and learn of their right to settle the land surrounding this hillside settlement, as promised by God to their forefathers.

The new building for the religious seminary, or yeshiva, opened just a month ago, despite controversy over any new construction here. A sign reading "danger construction" still hangs on the fence outside.

Located deep inside the occupied West Bank, near the Palestinian city of Ramallah, the settlement is considered illegal by most of the international community. But still, it has some influential backers, the most famous of whom now sits in the White House.

Several of President Trump's close associates have strong links to the right-wing Zionist community, home to 1,300 families. Trump's pick for U.S. ambassador to Israel, his former bankruptcy lawyer David Friedman, is president of the American Friends of Bet El Institutions, which raises around $2 million a year in funding. Its website says the group has helped bring about an influx in young couples and is working to create "facts on the ground" to prevent international attempts to uproot the community.

The family of Trump's son-in-law and adviser Jared Kushner has donated tens of thousands. Trump himself made a $10,000 donation in 2003, his foundation's tax filings show.

Palestinians say these communities present a major barrier to peace and the creation of a contiguous future state. It is a view that much of the world shares.

But Trump's ties to the settler movement could upend decades of U.S. policy on dealing with the conflict here, allowing Israel more freedom to build without censure from Washington, which previously considered West Bank settlements "illegitimate."

The first signs of a shift emerged last week, as Israel made a bold announcement of 2,500 new housing units in West Bank settlements, including some in Beit El. So far the Trump administration has avoided condemning the move.

"We are now more hopeful," Yael Ben-Yashar, who has lived in Beit El for 20 years, acts as the settlements spokeswoman and runs tours, said this week. "We think it may be a new era."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Beit El was established in 1977 by members of a right-wing messianic activist movement determined that Jews return to repopulate Judea and Samaria, the biblical name for the West Bank. Despite restrictions on building, it has burgeoned from a hardscrabble hilltop outpost of a few caravans to a small town dotted with palm trees and a clinic and schools.

The area of Beit El, meaning "House of God," held particular resonance for the settlers. It was believed to be the site where, according to the Bible, Jacob had his dream of angels ascending and descending a ladder to heaven, when God promised him that his descendants would return to the surrounding land.

"Today, in Beit El, we are living that dream," Ben-Yashar said from an observation point on top of a water tanker, from which the view stretches from Tel Aviv to the West to Mount Scopus to the south and the Golan Heights to the north. In the center of the viewing platform a mosaic depicts a map of greater Israel.

"You can see why God promised it here," she said. "You can see it all from here."

Nearby, down a dirt track, is the smooth flat rock where believers say Jacob slept. The site and the settlement attract about 5,000 visitors a year, said Ben-Yashar.

Some also visit its small winery, run by Hillel Manne and his wife, Nina, who met Friedman when he came to pick grapes several years ago.

"I think it was just after 2008 because I remember we joked he'd made a lot of money," Manne said with a chuckle, referring to Friedman's work as a bankruptcy lawyer during the financial crash. His wife described Friedman as a "family person."

"He came with all the family, his wife is wonderful, too," she said.

Friedman, the son of an Orthodox rabbi was picked as ambassador by Trump, despite having no diplomatic experience. He has publicly said that the "two-state narrative" needs to end, is a staunch supporter of settlements, and has said he expects to work from Jerusalem. A move of the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem has been opposed by Palestinians and would be seen as tacit recognition of Israel's sovereignty over the contested city.

But Hillel Manne said he fears that Friedman, and a more sympathetic ear in the White House, still may not be able to change much.

"It's good to see people excited," he said of Friedman's appointment. "But if you want change you'll need big change at the State Department. The State Department staff, they've managed the U.S. to bet on a lot of losers."

"This land was promised to me as a Jew," said Nina Manne. "It is ridiculous that we need to live in this situation. That we have to justify ourselves to be here."

But Beit El was largely established on private Palestinian land that had been designated by the Israeli state for military purposes, according to a report published by the Israeli newspaper Haaretz.

Approval for 20 new units came last week when the expansion in the West Bank was announced, according to Beit El's mayor, Shay Alon.

The plans are "disastrous" said Hanan Ashrawi, a member of the Palestinian Liberation Organization's executive committee, condemning Israeli "land theft."

"It is evident that Israel is exploiting the inauguration of the new American administration to escalate its violations and the prevention of any existence of a Palestinian state," she said in a statement, urging the international community to take action.

For Alon, however, the expansion plan didn't go far enough. He said he felt "ambivalent" about the news, given that 300 new units in Beit El had been promised when several apartment blocks were razed by the government five years ago.

Building permits were restricted for years under former president Barack Obama, and Alon hopes that Friedman "is the sort of person who can bring about a change."

Like other Orthodox residents here, he believes their presence is preordained. Yishai Babad was the ninth family to arrive, setting up a factory that makes tefillin – small leather phylacteries containing verses from the Torah.

He said Obama "loved the Arabs and not the Jews," but that the incoming administration would make no difference.

"We don't believe that the policy towards Beit El is going to change anything, because it's all written in the scriptures," he said. "We've always had difficulties, but all of Israel was built despite the difficulties."

Rice Blasts Trump For Not Mentioning Jews In Holocaust Statement

By Nikita Vladimirov

The Hill, January 28, 2017

Former National Security Advisor Susan Rice on Saturday tore into President Trump for releasing a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day without mentioning the Jewish victims.

"What sickness enables a statement on [Holocaust Memorial Day] that ignores 6 million Jews! Just imagine the response if Pres. Obama did that," Susan Rice said in a tweet.

The White House statement on Friday included quotes from President Donald Trump, who did not mention Jews.

"It is with a heavy heart and somber mind that we remember and honor the victims, survivors, heroes of the Holocaust. It is impossible to fully fathom the depravity and horror inflicted on innocent people by Nazi terror," Trump said in a statement.

"In the name of the perished, I pledge to do everything in my power throughout my Presidency, and my life, to ensure that the forces of evil never again defeat the powers of good. Together, we will make love and tolerance prevalent throughout the world," he added.

Rice criticized the president's use of the phrase "innocent people," arguing it does not adequately reflect the genocide that was committed against Jews.

"'Innocents' in [Holocaust Memorial Day] statement refers to all civilians killed in WW2. Not genocide against jews," she tweeted, adding a hashtag "#whitewashinghistory."

May's Mission To Woo Trump A Success, But Makes Some Uneasy

By Jill Lawless

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – Prime Minister Theresa May went to Washington, and President Donald Trump extended the hand of friendship. Literally.

May left Washington after a 24-hour visit as Saturday's British newspapers splashed front-page photos of the two leaders touching hands as they walked at the White House before a strikingly collegial news conference.

May wanted her meeting, Trump's first as president with a foreign leader, to revitalize the trans-Atlantic "special relationship." She got her wish – delighting those who think Trump's presidency will be good for Britain but alarming others who loathe the brash Republican populist.

She flew home – after a stop in Turkey Saturday to meet President Recep Tayyip Erdogan – with Trump's commitment not to abandon NATO, his praise for what he called "this most special relationship" and – a prize she had eagerly sought – the first steps toward an early trade deal with Britain once it leaves the European Union.

Britain can't begin formal negotiations with other countries until it actually leaves the bloc, likely in 2019 at the earliest. But May's office said Saturday that she and Trump had agreed to start high-level talks and joint working groups immediately to ensure "a seamless transition to a new bilateral relationship."

Trade between the two countries is already worth 150 billion pounds ($188 billion) a year, and May said a future trade deal "could provide huge benefits to our economic muscle and will give businesses additional certainty and confidence."

Trump did not come away empty handed from the meeting, either. He gets the seal of approval from a generally well-respected British prime minister. And there's an invitation from Queen Elizabeth II to come for a state visit later this year – a treat for a president with Scottish roots and a taste for opulence.

So there was satisfaction from May's team aboard her RAF Voyager jet at how well the hastily arranged trip had gone.

May also praised Trump's "stunning" election victory and declared that they shared a commitment to make government serve "working people." May's embrace of aspects of Trump's policies infuriated her opponents in Britain and could make other European leaders uneasy.

British Liberal Democrat leader Tim Farron said May "clearly spent her time with Trump dodging his despicable comments on torture, on women, on Muslims and on Mexicans."

Labour Party leader Jeremy Corbyn said May "failed to challenge Trump and stand up for our values" at a joint news conference with the president Friday.

Trump, meanwhile, extolled Britain's vote to leave the EU, saying Brexit would be "a tremendous asset and not a tremendous liability."

Those comments and the warmth of the visit drew approval from the pro-Brexit sections of Britain's press.

"It was one of the most extraordinary days in the long history of U.K.-U.S. relations," said the Daily Mail under the headline "Love-In at the White House" and a picture of the hand-holding moment.

May's office said Trump offered his hand in a chivalrous gesture as the pair approached an unexpected ramp, and she took it.

The trip will provide images for countless future stories about the trans-Atlantic bond. As well as the shoulder-to-shoulder press conference, May got a handshake in the Oval Office beside a bust of Winston Churchill that has become minor obsession for sections of the British press since it was moved to another spot in the White House by President

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Barack Obama. Trump restored it to a prominent place beside the Oval Office fireplace.

At times it seemed the visit would be overshadowed by Trump-related headlines that had nothing to do with May, including his feud with Mexico over who would pay for the border wall.

While May was in town the White House announced that Trump would speak by phone with Russian President Vladimir Putin Saturday, amid speculation he could be preparing to lift U.S. sanctions over Ukraine. May said Britain wants to see the sanctions stay in place.

And at the news conference with May, Trump repeated his belief that torture works – though he said he would defer to Defense Secretary James Mattis, who thinks otherwise. Britain, May stressed during the trip, is firmly against torture.

May had scarcely left when Trump issued an executive order barring all refugees from entering the U.S. for four months and imposing a 90-day ban on people from seven Muslim-majority countries.

On the whole, May emerged from the joint appearance looking confident and controlled. Trump, too, was notably calm and measured in her presence.

When May said Trump has assured her he was "100 percent" behind NATO, a body he once called "obsolete," the president muttered his agreement.

May's office told reporters that warm conversation had flowed during the pair's working lunch – and that Trump told an aide to keep the menu card so he could remember the special occasion.

Downing St. said conversation turned to Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan, and Trump told May he wanted their relationship to be "even better" than that famously close and productive partnership.

At the press conference, Trump said he was confident the pair were going to get along.

"I am a people person," Trump said. "I think you are also, Theresa."

May Under Fire Over Her Failure To Condemn Trump's Refugee Ban

By Robert Hutton

Bloomberg Politics, January 29, 2017

Prime Minister Theresa May faces a political storm on her return from visiting Donald Trump for her repeated failure to condemn the U.S. president's order limiting immigration from Muslim-majority countries.

Trump on Friday indefinitely banned the entry of people fleeing Syria, temporarily froze the entry of other refugees and prohibited entry by people from seven majority-Muslim nations for 90 days. The order is needed, Trump said, to prevent terrorists from entering the U.S.

May's refusal to publicly disagree with him has unleashed a flood of criticism at home, where 5 percent of the population is Muslim. Most damaging is the fury from her own Conservative Party colleagues at a particularly delicate time in the Brexit process. She only has a majority of 16 votes in the 650-member House of Commons.

Nadhim Zahawi, an Iraqi-born Tory lawmaker, pointed out that the ban covered him and his wife. Another Tory, Sarah Wollaston, said Trump should not be invited to address Parliament in his state visit to London later this year. Heidi Allen, also a Conservative, scolded May for being afraid to tell "someone powerful when they're wrong."

In Ankara, May was asked three times what she thought of the ban, and three times she ignored the question. Only when journalists heckled her to answer for a second time did she respond: "The United States is responsible for the United States' own policy on refugees."

Going into the White House, May knew that Trump's policies toward Muslims were going to be a problem for her domestic audience. On the flight out and even at a news conference with Trump she avoided questions that at the time were hypothetical. Until they weren't.

May's first trip to the White House had earlier been celebrated as a triumph, with Trump accepting a personal invitation to Buckingham Palace. On the plane back, her aides retreated to the curtained area at the front of her Royal Air Force plane, and weren't seen again for the rest of the three-and-a-half hour flight.

Trump-May Meeting A Win For Two Great Nations

New York Post, January 28, 2017

It's good to see the US-UK "special relationship" is back, along with the Oval Office bust of Winston Churchill, after President Trump's meeting Friday with British Prime Minister Theresa May.

The two very different leaders owe their offices to twin populist surprises — Trump's remarkable Election Day win, and the British vote to leave the European Union, which prompted the resignation of May's predecessor, David Cameron.

The surprises kept up with the failure of the elites' doomsday predictions: UK growth sped up after the Brexit vote, and beat expectations in the latest quarter, too. Over here, the "Trump rally" has pushed the Dow above 20,000, with polls also showing average Americans' economic optimism on the rise.

The two countries seem to be in step again — as in the days of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, or Bill Clinton and Tony Blair.

Trump was right to note that the "special relationship between our two countries has been one of the great forces in history for justice and for peace" and that "a free and independent Britain is a blessing to the world."

And May was on point in her turn: "We are at a moment now when we can build an even stronger special relationship" — since she must deal with EU leaders eager to make Brexit as painful as possible, while Trump has to show how his "America first" approach can boost traditional US alliances.

On that note, it was good to hear May report, after their closed-door meeting: "We are united in recognition of NATO as the bulwark of our collective defense."

For the new president's first face-to-face with a fellow world leader, it couldn't have gone better.

French Leader Chides US Populism, Urges European Unity

By Barry Hatton

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

LISBON, Portugal (AP) – French President Francois Hollande on Saturday urged Europe to present a united front against populist movements which, he said, are being encouraged by political developments in the United States.

"Europe is facing a moment of truth," Hollande said. "The issue is populism. What we are hearing from the U.S. encourages populism and even extremism. They are saying that Europe should not take immigrants, shouldn't stay together, not believe in climate change."

European Union countries should stick to their principles and defend their interests – and stand firm in talks with U.S. President Donald Trump, Hollande said.

"Europe should be true to itself. It should guide itself according to its values, its principles, and its interests," Hollande said on the sidelines of an informal meeting with six other EU leaders in Lisbon, Portugal. "We should engage in discussions (with the U.S.) that sometimes should be very firm."

"And as long as there are statements from the U.S. president about Europe, when he speaks about the model of Brexit for other countries, when the U.S. president talks about climate change ... saying he's not convinced of it, we should respond to him. When he takes protectionist measures, we should respond to him. When he destabilizes the economies of other countries, not only European ones, we should respond to him. When he rejects the arrival of refugees, while Europe has done its duty, we should respond to him," he told reporters.

Italian premier Paolo Gentiloni said the EU will "find a way to work with the U.S. administration" but added that the bloc should remain true to its core values including human rights and anti-protectionism.

The EU leaders emphasized their commitment to the European Union, in the wake of Britain's vote to leave the bloc.

"We believe that in a world confronted with growing uncertainties and instability, we will be stronger by acting together," they said in a joint statement. "Weakening Europe is not an option."

However, they said they hoped "to have the United Kingdom as a close partner of the EU."

The Questions That Could Reshape A Worried Europe In 2017

By Rick Gladstone

New York Times, January 28, 2017

Europe is facing multiple tribulations in 2017, engulfed in uncertainties over terrorism, borders, migration, economics and President Trump's new America First message booming from across the Atlantic.

"It's not the first time Europe has been challenged by crisis," said Anna-Lena Högenauer, a researcher at the Institute of Political Science at the University of Luxembourg, but "there's definitely a combination of crises."

Here are some of the potentially disruptive issues and events looming for the year that could reshape — or at least deepen — the fractures in the European Union, a 28-nation bloc of more than a half-billion people and the world's largest single free-trade zone.

Negotiations for Britain's exit from the European Union, known as "Brexit," the outcome of a referendum last June, could officially start by the end of March, a self-imposed deadline set by Prime Minister Theresa May. But the run-up to those negotiations — further complicated by a Supreme Court ruling that Ms. May needs Parliament's approval to begin the process — has created enormous uncertainties. They include how European Union citizens residing in Britain — and the British citizens residing in other European Union countries — will work and live if they cannot freely traverse borders as they do now.

Big banks and other multinational companies with operations in London and elsewhere in Britain are not awaiting the outcome of the negotiations, expected to last two years, that will determine the scope of the country's changed status. They are making contingency plans to move thousands of jobs elsewhere. Other European Union members are eager to get those jobs. Their leaders also have suggested that Britain must be penalized economically to discourage further defections from the bloc.

Britain's decision also threatens to alter its geography and possibly stoke political instability. Scotland and Northern Ireland had wanted to stay within the European Union, and may now move to leave Britain. A new referendum on Scottish independence — reprising a measure that was defeated in 2014 — is now considered likely. Unrest in Northern Ireland could resume if the border with Ireland, a European Union member, is restricted.

Guy Verhofstadt, the European Union's negotiator for Britain's exit, wrote in The Guardian on Jan. 18 that "Brexit will be a sad, surreal and exhausting process."

Turkey has been negotiating to become a European Union member for more than a decade, but that prospect has turned more doubtful, partly because of the authoritarian actions of the Turkish president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, particularly since a failed coup attempt in July.

Increasingly exasperated with the European Union, Mr. Erdogan has suggested that he may hold a referendum in Turkey this year on whether to withdraw its membership application. Mr. Erdogan has also suggested that he may seek to restore the death penalty in Turkey, a step that other European leaders say would disqualify the country from joining the European Union.

Nonetheless, European officials are loath to suspend the negotiations for fear that Mr. Erdogan will scrap an agreement to restrict the flow of migrants and refugees from Turkey into Europe, an exodus that has placed extraordinary strains on the Continent and helped incite nationalist and populist anger.

The country that came to symbolize Europe's economic travails a few years ago has receded from the headlines somewhat, obscured by Brexit, fears of terrorist attacks in European cities and coming elections in the Netherlands, France and Germany. But Greece's economy remains anemic and in need of more debt relief.

Despite three bailouts in five years, poverty rates are increasing and the unemployment rate is Europe's highest. Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras of the leftist Syriza Party, who rose to power in 2015 on his defiance of Greece's creditors and threat to leave the European Union's single-currency zone, is sagging in the polls, raising the possibility of political turbulence and new elections.

Negotiations for further restructuring of Greece's debts, involving Germany and the International Monetary Fund, also have encountered difficulties. "If the I.M.F. and Germany cannot find a way out, this is a serious problem," said Dimitrios Argyroulis, a political economics scholar at the University of Sheffield.

The chronically troubled economy of Italy, the European Union's fourth largest, has aroused growing concern as possibly the next Greek-style debt crisis. The main reason is the weakness of Italy's big banks, which are carrying hundreds of billions of dollars' worth of bad loans. They are reluctant to lend more money, which is precisely what Italy needs to stimulate its economy.

Italy's debt levels also have irked Germany, Europe's strongest economy, where leaders are reluctant to help finance any bailout. "The current developments do not bode well and point to the possibility of repeating the Greece disaster on a much larger scale," Geopolitical Futures, a forecasting firm, said in a Jan. 20 posting on its website.

The regional parliament of Spain's semiautonomous Catalonia region voted in November 2015 to begin a process to achieve independence in 2017 — an outcome the Spanish government has vowed to block. But the secessionists, buoyed by the Brexit referendum, say the momentum of nationalist movements in Europe is on their side. Whether they will succeed remains unclear at best.

The European Union and United States have closely coordinated their regimen of economic sanctions imposed on Russia in 2014, a response to Russia's annexation of the Crimean Peninsula and military actions in eastern Ukraine. But President Trump has injected uncertainty into Europe over a unified stand toward Russia, suggesting he wants to ease or terminate the sanctions. Mr. Trump, whose amity toward Russia is a political issue in the United States, also has criticized NATO, asserting that the alliance is obsolete — a description that Russian officials have welcomed.

While Mr. Trump's subordinates have sought to reassure European Union leaders that the United States remains a reliable ally, doubts have been planted. Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the foreign minister of Germany at the time Trump made those remarks, said they had "caused astonishment."

Emboldened by the momentum of Brexit and Mr. Trump, nationalist politicians espousing hostility toward the European Union and Muslim immigrants have made strong gains in campaigns for coming elections in three European countries, including the two largest.

In the Netherlands, where a national vote is set for March 15, the populist lawmaker Geert Wilders, who wants to slash immigration and follow Britain out of the European Union, is doing well in the polls. Other Dutch politicians, including Prime Minister Mark Rutte, have ruled out working with Mr. Wilders and his Party for Freedom and Democracy, which most likely means that Mr. Wilders will not be the next prime minister.

But in a sign of Mr. Wilders's influence, Mr. Rutte has taken his own hard-right turn, warning immigrants against behavior that offends the "silent majority."

In France, where presidential elections are set for April 23 with a runoff between the two top candidates on May 7, the rise of the extreme right has been a dominant theme. Marine Le Pen, leader of the National Front, has said she hopes to replicate Mr. Trump's success. She supports a referendum on European Union membership and new border controls.

Germany holds federal elections Sept. 24, which will determine the future of Chancellor Angela Merkel. But her positions on European unity, open borders and generosity toward refugees have seriously weakened her popularity. Mr. Trump mocked and insulted her during his campaign, describing his Democratic adversary, Hillary Clinton, as "America's Merkel," and called the German leader's refugee policy "insane."

At the same time, Germany's biggest political story is the rapid ascent of the far-right Alternative for Germany party, which has evoked memories of the Nazis as it campaigns on denunciations of Ms. Merkel, the euro, immigration and Islam.

Even if Ms. Merkel survives to win a fourth term as chancellor, political analysts see her as a weakened figure, and at the worst possible time.

"Europe has never needed a strong Merkel more," Ian Bremmer, founder and president of the Eurasia Group, a political risk consultant firm in Washington, said this month in an assessment of the year's most dangerous risks. "In 2017, she'll be unavailable for the role."

Ten Centuries Later, A Pope And Knights Do Battle

By Jason Horowitz

New York Times, January 28, 2017

It began as a fight over staffing. Then came a dispute about condoms, followed by papal concerns about Freemasons. Now it has become a full-scale proxy war between Pope Francis and the Vatican traditionalists who oppose him, with the battleground being a Renaissance palace flanked by Jimmy Choo and Hermès storefronts on Via dei Condotti, Rome's most exclusive street.

The palace is the headquarters of the Knights of Malta, the medieval Roman Catholic order. For months, an ugly, if quiet, spat over staffing simmered behind the order's walls before spilling across the Tiber River to the Vatican, setting off a back-and-forth between the two camps. Francis and his lieutenants sent angry letters. The Knights ignored them, claiming sovereignty.

This past week, the dispute finally blew up. Fed up, Francis took the extraordinary steps of demanding the resignation of the order's leader — a decision the Knights officially accepted Saturday — and announcing that a papal delegate would step in.

Conservatives promptly denounced what they called an illegal annexation and ideological purging by a power-obsessed pontiff, while liberal observers saw the whole episode as resulting from an act of subterfuge by the pope's most public critic within the Vatican hierarchy, the American cardinal Raymond Burke.

A seemingly obscure intra-Catholic squabble had erupted into an unexpected shock to the church with ideological fault lines running to the top of the Vatican.

"The Vatican is a thing built of tradition," said John Thavis, the author of "The Vatican Diaries" and a veteran church analyst, "and once those traditional parts start feuding with each other, that is a dangerous sign."

Francis remains one of the world's most popular figures, but the spat with the Knights is a small indicator of how the political tensions rippling across the globe are alive in the Vatican, too. Only a year ago, Francis' calls to fight climate change and help migrants seemed to place him in the lead of a progressive global vanguard, in keeping with his push for a more welcoming church.

Now, suddenly, he is more politically isolated. The election of President Trump and the rise of far-right populists in Europe have ushered in an angrier era — and emboldened traditionalists inside the Vatican who sense that the once-impregnable pope could be vulnerable.

The Knights of Malta is a bastion of Catholic tradition. Founded in the 11th century by Amalfian merchants to help Christian pilgrims in the Holy Land, it later became a military force, defending the faith during the Crusades and eventually holding off the armies of the Ottoman Empire from its fortress in Malta. The group, now with a wealthy and aristocratic membership of elite Catholics who parade in ornate raiment, has more recently specialized in aiding refugees and the poor in more than 100 countries.

Until this past week, the order was led by the conservative and elaborately titled His Most Eminent

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Highness the Prince and Grand Master of the Order of Malta, Matthew Festing of Britain, a former Sotheby's representative who had taken a monastic oath.

Long-building tensions between Mr. Festing and the order's Grand Chancellor Albrecht von Boeselager of Germany, whose father participated in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler, escalated in recent months amid accusations that Mr. Boeselager had knowingly overseen the distribution of condoms as head of the order's charitable arm. Into this volatile situation stepped Cardinal Burke.

In 2014, Francis had demoted Cardinal Burke, a leader of the church's traditionalist movement, from his position on the Vatican's Supreme Court. The cardinal's supporters say Francis did this because of Cardinal Burke's opposition to the pope's tentative opening to the possibility of allowing divorced Catholics to receive communion.

Cardinal Burke's exile was at least a cushy one, as the pope named him as the Knights' patron and liaison to the Vatican, where he would be out of the way.

But the soft-spoken cardinal has made his presence felt.

During the summer, as tensions mounted inside the order, Michael Hichborn, the president of the Lepanto Institute, a conservative Catholic organization in Virginia, conducted what he called a "short investigation" into the order's international aid arm, which Mr. Boeselager oversaw.

Mr. Hichborn said he had discovered that the aid organization was promoting the use of condoms and other contraceptives in Africa and Myanmar, a violation of church rules.

"As I was digging around I thought, 'Well, Cardinal Burke ought to know about this,'" Mr. Hichborn said in an interview.

In November, he sent a summary to Cardinal Burke's office and said he was told that the cardinal "would be working on something" regarding the information.

A few days later, Cardinal Burke relayed his concerns about Mr. Boeselager to Francis. According to supporters of the cardinal, the pope then instructed him to root out from the order elements of Freemasonry, Vatican shorthand for adherents of a secular moral view. But other people familiar with the events inside the order said the pope had also urged Cardinal Burke and the order's leadership to settle the dispute through dialogue.

Instead, Mr. Festing and Cardinal Burke met Mr. Boeselager on Dec. 6 and requested his resignation, claiming, Mr. Boeselager said in a statement, "that this was in accordance with the wishes of the Holy See."

Mr. Boeselager denied knowing about the condom distribution program and considered the move a coup and an attempt to tarnish him as a "liberal Catholic." He argued that once he had discovered the program, he had informed the Vatican and it ended.

He also refused to leave, setting off a disciplinary procedure that led to his suspension, and reached out to the Vatican for confirmation that the pope desired his removal. Mr. Boeselager declined to comment for this article.

Francis was apparently not pleased about the firing and did not want the dispute to spill into the public, which it did when The Tablet, a Catholic publication in England, broke the news.

The pope was already critical of the ornate dress favored by the Knights (red military jacket and gold epaulets) and by Cardinal Burke (a long train of billowing red silk known as a cappa magna). Francis also had a history of run-ins with the Knights during his time as a cardinal in Argentina.

So on Dec. 21, Francis wrote directly to Mr. Festing, conveying his decisions on what he called the "painful circumstances" and making clear that those decisions had "value, regardless of anything else to the contrary." Attached to his letter, signed simply "Francesco," were more letters from his second-highest-ranking official, Secretary of State Pietro Parolin, stating that "His Holiness asked for dialogue as the way to confront and resolve eventual problems" and that "he never spoke, instead, of kicking someone out!"

Cardinal Parolin also wrote that the firing "not be attributed to the will of the pope." Critically, he noted that the Knights, because of the group's status as a lay religious order, fell under the pope's authority, and that the pope had formed a commission to investigate the firing of Mr. Boeselager. But Mr. Festing refused to comply with the papal commission, citing the order's status as a sovereign entity and raising questions about the integrity of a commission full of Mr. Boeselager's allies.

"I think maybe he was getting bad advice" from Cardinal Burke, said one senior Vatican official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak by the Vatican. (Cardinal Burke and Mr. Festing declined to comment.)

Others say Mr. Festing hardly needed to be egged on by Cardinal Burke, and note that despite having no territory, the order is, in fact, sovereign, issuing its own passports and stamps and conducting diplomatic missions.

Either way, the Vatican was not thrilled. On Jan. 17, it issued an unusually tough statement supporting the commission and rejecting "any attempt to discredit these members of the group and their work." The commission ultimately ruled that the pope did have authority over the Knights of Malta.

On Tuesday, he exercised it. He called Mr. Festing to the Vatican and asked for him to step down, a move the Vatican announced the next day. The order followed with its own statement, saying Mr. Festing's resignation would become official once the order's counselors met on Via dei Condotti to formally accept it. On Saturday, they did just that, immediately reinstating Mr. Boeselager and promising to collaborate with the pope's delegate.

This delighted the pope's supporters, who said it showed that conniving conservatives would not push him around.

But supporters of Mr. Festing were horrified by the Vatican's de facto takeover. Supporters of Cardinal Burke complained that the pope, for all his talk of fostering debate, was intolerant of opposing views, especially more orthodox ones.

"It sends a message to the rest of the Catholic world that if you try to stand for orthodoxy in the church, you are going to be sent away," Mr. Hichborn said. "And the people pushing for heterodoxy will be put in power."

What was not up for debate was that, in the Vatican, Francis gets his way.

At the order's headquarters, a stately wooden mailbox hangs on the doorman's wall. The three top slots are reserved for the order's top three officials. On Wednesday morning, Mr. Boeselager's name had been erased. Mr. Festing's would soon be gone.

The third slot belonged to the order's interim leader, Grand Commander Ludwig Hoffmann von Rumerstein. But only, a Vatican statement made clear, "pending the appointment of the papal delegate."

Meet The Youngsters Helping Solve Japan's Caregiving Crisis. Like Kunio Odaira, 72

By Anna Fifield

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

It's lunch hour at the Cross Heart nursing home, and a 72-year-old, slightly stooped man is spooning soup and filling tea cups.

But Kunio Odaira isn't one of the residents. He's one of the staff, part of an increasingly gray workforce in an increasingly gray country.

"I enjoy talking to the people here. It's fun, but it's also hard work," Odaira said during a break from his caregiving duties on a recent day.

Japan is considered a "super-aging" society. More than a quarter of the population is over 65, a figure set to rise to 40 percent by 2050. The average life expectancy is 85, and that means many Japanese remain relatively healthy for a good two decades after retirement age.

At the same time, the birthrate has plummeted to well below the level needed to keep the population stable. Now home to 128 million people, Japan is expected to number less than 100 million by 2050, according to government projections.

That means authorities need to think about ways to keep seniors healthy and active for longer, but also about how to augment the workforce to cope with labor shortages.

Enter the septuagenarian caregiver.

At Cross Heart, more than half of the 119 caregivers are over 60, and 15 of them are over 70.

"When we advertise for people to work here, we get lots of responses from older people, not younger people," said nursing home director Kaori Yokoo in the lobby where residents were doing leg curls and chest presses on weight machines.

The foundation that runs this nursing home and others in Kanagawa Prefecture has raised the official retirement age to 70 but allows employees to keep working until 80 if they want to and can. Municipalities around the country are also actively recruiting people over 60 to do lighter duties at nursing homes.

It's one way of dealing with the problem. Meanwhile, researchers are working on robots that can lift the elderly out of beds and wheelchairs, and inward-looking Japan is slowly coming around to the idea that it may need to allow in more foreign workers.

Although older workers have constraints — some can't do the heavier tasks — they also offer advantages over younger workers who want time off for their children, said Yokoo, who is 41.

"Plus, because they're close in age to the residents, they can relate to each other more," she said. "We younger people think this must be nice for them. Older staff can understand things like physical pains more because they are living through the same things."

Some of the older workers here are doing it because they need the money. For others, the money is a nice benefit, but the main motivation is the activity and sense of community.

Kiyoko Tsuboi, a 95-year-old who comes into the rest home during the day, said she likes having Odaira around.

"He's very attentive to our needs and knows things like how hot we like our tea. My son is not as kind as Odaira-san," Tsuboi said as Odaira cleared away the lunch dishes. "He's quite active despite his age, and even though he's a man, he has an eye for detail."

The dynamic works well for Odaira, too, who started here 17 years ago after retiring from his job in the sales department of an auto parts maker. He works eight hours a day, four days a week.

His father died when he was small, his mother when he was 22. "It's not like I'm replacing my mother, but I thought I could help someone else's parents," he said.

He also does it to stay young, Odaira said with a twinkle in his eye. "I think it's good for me physically and mentally, so as long as I can keep working, I will."

He's not the oldest worker here, though. That title is shared by two 78-year-olds, a man who works in the office and Noriko Fukuju, who helps with pickups and drop-offs and does activities with "the old people."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"It's fun. I enjoy it," she said.

Hiroko Akiyama, at the University of Tokyo's Institute of Gerontology, said a Japanese 65-year-old is in much better physical and mental shape than a 65-year-old a few decades ago. "They are full of energy, and healthy and long-living," she said.

Akiyama's research has found that working helps keep seniors that way. "They operate on a regular schedule. They wake up, get ready, go to work and talk to people and stay connected," she said. "We had a depressed old woman who changed completely after she started working."

Still, Japan can't rely solely on seniors or, potentially, robots to staff its nursing homes, where the need will only grow as the population ages, analysts say.

Japan has agreements with Indonesia, Vietnam and the Philippines under which applicants who complete job training and pass a Japanese language test can work at a Japanese nursing home.

But if they want to stay beyond three years, they must pass a national caregiver's exam so difficult that 40 percent of Japanese applicants fail. Many Japanese also express concern about cultural differences.

Next year, the Japanese government will loosen the regulations slightly and set up a technical intern program, but there will still be time limits and difficult tests to pass.

Perhaps 2,000 people will come to Japan through the intern program, said Yasuhiro Yuki, an expert on elderly care at Shukutoku University. "But we hear we will need 300,000 more caregivers in the next 10 years," he said. "So I still don't think we will have enough."

That means aging caregivers will increasingly become the norm.

"I can do this at least for two more years," said Fukuju, the 78-year-old, before she dashed out the door to renew her driver's license.

Russia's Blow To Women

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

Victims of domestic violence are often helpless to fight back, for reasons of fear, shame and feelings of defeat. A civilized society enacts laws to protect such vulnerable people. The decision by the Russian parliament to change the law in order to decriminalize some forms of domestic violence is wrong-headed and sends a message that brutality in a family is legitimate.

On Friday, the Russian lower house of parliament, the State Duma, approved a bill that decriminalizes domestic battery for first-time offenders. Battery against a family member will be subject to administrative rather than criminal penalty if it does not cause serious medical harm. Violations can be punished with a fine of up to 30,000 rubles or about $500, police custody of up to 15 days or compulsory community service of up to 120 hours. Second-time offenses and those causing serious medical harm would still be criminal violations and punishable by up to two years in prison.

The reason this came about now is that last summer, parliament decriminalized battery among strangers but not among family members, which remained a criminal matter. This irked some lawmakers and the Russian Orthodox Church. They felt that it meant a parent could be punished more harshly for slapping a child than a neighbor. According to the Economist, the church said that "reasonable and loving use of physical punishment is an essential part of the rights given to parents by God himself." The result was the legislation just passed. After the Duma voted 380 to 3 on a third reading, the bill went to the upper chamber, the Federation Council, where it is expected to pass easily and then be signed by President Vladimir Putin.

The move fits a larger drive by Mr. Putin and some of his allies to instill what they call traditional family values. There's precious little data, but by all accounts, domestic violence remains a serious problem in Russian society. One Interior Ministry estimate is that 12,000 women are killed every year in assaults by their partners. But there are deep divisions over the issue. In Soviet times, the presence of the state was pervasive, and now some people say the state should keep its nose out of family matters. At the same time, there has been a growing grass-roots awareness, including a social media campaign in Russia and Ukraine last year under the hashtag "#IAmNotAfraidToSpeak."

What's most objectionable about the law is the broader message it sends: that a domestic assault that doesn't break bones or result in a concussion — a beating that could be humiliating, painful and cause deep emotional damage to the victim — should bring little or no penalty from the state. It is hard to see how a healthy society and healthy families benefit when the most vulnerable are left exposed.

Kabul On Edge Amid Standoff Between Afghan Government And Vice President

By Pamela Constable

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

An ominous week-long standoff between the government and its rogue first vice president is choking traffic and dominating talk in the edgy Afghan capital. Police units have been stationed at strategic points near his fortified compound, and everyone is asking the same question: Are they going to arrest Abdurrashid Dostum?

Six weeks ago Dostum, 62, a powerful ethnic Uzbek boss and former warlord with a history of alleged war crimes and personal abuses, was publicly accused of brutality and rape by a former governor and political rival, Ahmad Eschi, who charged that Dostum had held him captive in a rural stronghold and ordered him sodomized with a military rifle.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The scandalous allegation thrust the government of President Ashraf Ghani into a tense predicament. Western governments and human rights groups strongly urged him to take legal action, calling the case a major test of civilian rule and institutions. Some influential Afghans counseled caution, warning that Dostum and his armed followers could react violently and urging Ghani to settle the matter through negotiations.

The president sternly declared he would follow the law, and his attorney general vowed to undertake a thorough, impartial investigation. Repeated letters were sent to Dostum requesting that he and his guards appear for questioning, but they went unanswered. On Monday, arrest warrants were issued for nine of his employees, and they were also ignored. Dostum's spokesmen insist he cannot be held accountable.

Yet no move has been made to detain Dostum or his men. The first vice president, who could be suspended from his post by parliament for defying the law, remains sequestered in his militarized compound in a wealthy residential enclave, protected by armed guards and reporting for no official duties. There are also reports that some of the police units in the area are commanded by Dostum loyalists.

"President Ghani does not have the power to act. You need a strong and serious police commander to go after him," said Atiqullah Amarkhail, a retired general. "In Afghanistan, there are many centers of power," he said. "The government is divided, and the army and police are loyal to individuals and factions."

Government officials said they are in no rush to go after Dostum and that they are focused on following proper legal procedures to avoid any suggestion of a political motive. "We want to be extremely careful, because this is such a sensitive case. It is going to take time," one official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly. He said Dostum's associates "understand the gravity of the situation" and are in discussions on possible ways to comply.

Meanwhile, the government's uncertain relationships with other former warlords are further complicating the tense picture, raising alarms at an unsettled political moment. Even as the government attempts to bring Dostum to justice, it has invited fugitive militia leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar to return to Kabul in a peace deal, hoping to persuade Taliban insurgents to follow suit.

Hekmatyar, a onetime Cold War U.S. ally, turned his forces against the Afghan government a decade ago and was put on a U.N. terrorist list. He was supposed to return only if the United Nations lifted sanctions against him. But this week, his spokesman in Kabul suddenly announced that Hekmatyar plans to come to the capital anyway, reportedly bringing hundreds of armed supporters as he enters national politics.

Davood Moradian, director of the Afghan Institute for Strategic Studies, noted that both Dostum and Hekmatyar have popular followings, have been accused of serious wartime abuses and have never been held accountable. The government must take pains to ensure that Hekmatyar's "invitation to Kabul is not seen as the state following a political double standard, trying to bring one warlord to justice while unfolding a red carpet to receive the other," Moradian said.

The other strongman in this volatile mix is Attah Mohammed Noor, a wealthy northern governor and longtime rival of Dostum, who has been negotiating with Ghani to obtain more influence and status. Noor is seen as a possible replacement for Dostum or Ghani's governing partner, chief executive Abdullah Abdullah, with whom the president has had a rocky relationship since they took power two years ago.

In a recent interview, Noor said that he did not want to prejudge the charges against Dostum, but he called the case shameful. "We need the rule of law in Afghanistan, and no one should be above it," he said. Noor denied that he was seeking a senior appointment from Ghani, but he expressed concern that Dostum could retaliate against the government by unleashing violence or chaos in the north.

Some Afghan analysts said the politically debilitating charges against Dostum and the likely return of Hekmatyar could lead to dangerous ethnic divisions in the government and possibly strengthen the Taliban. Hekmatyar and Ghani are both ethnic Pashtuns, but Ghani is a Westernized intellectual, while Hekmatyar is a hard-line Islamist who could reinforce rather than help pacify the Taliban.

For the moment, though, it is Dostum who presents the most immediate challenge to Afghanistan's weak coalition government. The longer he remains bunkered in his luxury compound a dozen blocks from the presidential palace, defying legal orders and dragging out the case against him, the more it looks as though the elected government, for all its international backing, is being held hostage by a strongman from another era in Afghan history.

Former Warlord's Return Could Shake Up Afghan Politics

By Kathy Gannon

Associated Press, January 29, 2017

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) – The only insurgent leader to sign a peace pact with Afghanistan's government will return to the country within weeks, his chief negotiator says, in a move that could shake up Afghan politics and complicate the much wider war against the Taliban.

Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a former warlord who battled U.S. forces after the 2001 invasion and nursed a bitter rivalry with other Afghan factions, agreed to lay down arms last year. Amin Karim, his chief negotiator, told The Associated Press earlier this week that he would return to the capital in "a matter of weeks, not months."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Hekmatyar is seen as a potential rival to President Ashraf Ghani and Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah, who have governed the country through a shaky, U.S.-brokered power-sharing agreement since the disputed elections of 2014. His return could inject new political uncertainty as the government struggles to confront a reinvigorated Taliban that has been advancing on several fronts.

The former warlord battled the Soviets in the 1980s and then took part in the civil war that erupted after their withdrawal, clashing with the so-called Northern Alliance, in which Abdullah was a leading figure. Hekmatyar was driven out when the Taliban seized power in 1996, but returned after the American invasion, vowing to resist the foreign "occupation."

His forces were largely confined to just two provinces, however, and have carried out few attacks in recent years.

Last year he became the only insurgent leader to sign a peace agreement with the Afghan government, in what many hoped would provide a model for a wider reconciliation with the Taliban. But he has yet to return to the fold.

His Hezb-e-Islami party wants his name taken off the U.N. and the U.S. Treasury lists of wanted terrorists. Karim declined to say whether Hekmatyar would return to Afghanistan without first being removed from the lists, and there has been no indication that the U.N. or Washington is considering his removal. Both Canada and Britain consider Hezb-i-Islami to be a terrorist group.

Hekmatyar, like Ghani, hails from Afghanistan's ethnic Pashtun majority, and a revitalized Hezb-e-Islami could become a powerful player in the 2019 parliamentary elections, says Andrew Wilder, vice president of the Asia Program at the U.S. Institute of Peace.

"Hekmatyar's return to Kabul would certainly be significant," he said. "But the significance of his return, if it happens, will have a lot more to do with the impact of an influential Pashtun political figure who had been sidelined re-entering the political fray, and much less to do with moving the peace process forward.

The prospect of his return has already caused Abdullah's fractured Jamiat-e-Islami Party to try to unify its ranks in order to better compete, Wilder said in an email interview. Abdullah and Ghani are also political rivals, and traded accusations of fraud after the hard-fought election three years ago.

No one expects Hekmatyar's return to end the 15-year-old war with the Taliban, who control large swathes of rural territory in the south and east, and rule eight districts outright. A three-way struggle for power among Ghani, Abdullah and Hekmatyar could further divide the government at a critical time.

"The Taliban has ample momentum on the battlefield and is gaining territory, while Hezb-i-Islami is a shadow of its former self and not particularly active," said Michael Kugelman, deputy director of the Washington-based Wilson Center's South Asia program. "I simply don't think the Taliban will pay much mind to Hekmatyar and his peace deal with Kabul."

Karim, who negotiated the peace pact, lives behind two cordons of security in a heavily guarded Kabul villa. He accused unnamed Afghan rivals and regional countries of trying to sabotage Hekmatyar's return, saying several Hezb-i-Islami commanders who ventured into the capital have been arrested.

The government says it remains committed to the peace deal and Hekmatyar's return, which government spokesman Mohammad Haroon Chakhansuri said would be a "positive" step.

Taliban, Collecting Bills For Afghan Utilities, Tap New Revenue Sources

By Mujib Mashal And Najim Rahim

New York Times, January 28, 2017

The Afghan government faces a peculiar problem in at least two major provinces: It provides precious electricity, some of it imported at costly rates from neighboring countries, but Taliban militants collect most of the bills.

If the government cuts off power, it will further anger a population that is already disenchanted. If it does not, the revenue from the power will continue to provide more income to an already emboldened Taliban.

The Taliban, fighting the Afghan government and a large international military coalition, have long tapped into Afghanistan's lucrative drug trade and illegal mining, in addition to the streams of donations they receive from supporters abroad, mainly in the Persian Gulf states.

But as they have taken over increasingly large areas in the past two years, they have found new ways of diversifying and collecting revenue, according to interviews with officials, Taliban commanders and local residents.

The diversification of the revenue collection system, in the face of a central government largely dependent on Western donations and hobbled by corruption, has raised fears that the balance of the war could tilt even further in the year ahead, and that the insurgency is becoming more entrenched and acting as a shadow government in parts of the countryside.

"What it suggests, essentially, is that the group is becoming more efficient in systematically taxing the areas they either control or have a lot of influence on," said Timor Sharan, senior analyst for Afghanistan at the International Crisis Group, a research institute. "Efficiency of taxation is quite significant in terms of sustaining the group for a long time."

In addition to collecting electricity bills from thousands of homes in provinces such as Kunduz and Helmand, the insurgents levy taxes on potato harvests, flour mills, teachers' salaries, marriage ceremonies, and fuel and vegetable trucks crossing their checkpoints.

At the same time, the Taliban continue to pursue their original sources of funding. The United Nations, in a recent report, said narcotics, illegal mining and external donations remained major income streams, with the drug economy bringing in up to $400 million in 2016.

But the United Nations report also spoke of the group's diversification efforts.

"Analysis of Taliban revenue sources suggests that they remain highly diverse, with various income streams that enable the Taliban to quickly substitute for declining asset streams," the report said.

Mr. Sharan said the increased revenue collection was largely due to a restructuring of the insurgency spearheaded by its former leader, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Mansour, who was seen more as a businessman heavily involved in the drug trade than a conventional Taliban ideologue. Part of the reason for the change was an expected decline in external funding amid growing competition for resources from other militant groups like the Islamic State.

"Mansour, in his restructuring, gave more autonomy to the local Taliban groups and tasked them with finding more locally driven revenues and securing their funding at the local level," Mr. Sharan said.

The Taliban have also been hit by a dwindling number of major NATO military contracts and development projects from which they could take a cut.

Western and Afghan officials say the greater fund-raising autonomy for local commanders is also a consequence of chaos within the Taliban leadership and infighting over resources after an American drone strike killed Mullah Mansour in May.

A Taliban spokesman, Zabihullah Mujahid, said the group relied on a variety of resources, including Islamic taxes and offerings from farmers and local residents, donations from traders abroad and from Islamic countries, and booty captured from Afghan forces. He acknowledged that in their areas of control in places like Kunduz and Helmand, the Taliban collected the electricity bills.

"Our territory has expanded in some areas, and since our presence has increased there, our resources have also increased," Mr. Mujahid said.

At first glance, each strand of Taliban revenue might seem insignificant. But for an insurgency numbering about 30,000 men, who operate in small groups, it is a substantial sum.

The head of the power department in Kunduz Province, Hamidullah, said the Taliban were collecting electricity payments from close to 14,000 homes in the province, possibly as much as $200,000 for every two-month cycle.

Haji Ayoub, an elder from Boz Qandahari village, north of Kunduz city, said that two months ago, the Taliban had stopped government electricity workers and taken the bills they delivered by bicycle. Then, they started calling people to come to the local mosque and pay.

Mr. Ayoub said he owed the government about $200, for electricity used at his home and a flour mill he ran before it went bankrupt.

"The Taliban representative took the money," Mr. Ayoub said. "He didn't sign or stamp the bill. He just tore half of it and gave me back the other half and wrote something in his notebook."

He added, "I said, 'At least put your signature on the bill so I can bring it to the government to show that I have paid,' but he didn't."

In Helmand Province, members of the provincial council said most of the territory was controlled by the Taliban, who collected bills in places they held where there was electricity.

"We cannot switch off the electricity in Taliban areas, because then they create big problems for electrical poles along the way to cities like Kandahar and Lashkargah," said Nasrullah Qani, the power department's director in Helmand.

Residents in Helmand said the collection of electricity charges differed by district. In Kajaki district, the Taliban collect a fee once a year, from $60 to $150 depending on usage. In other areas, it is monthly.

"For each electric bulb you use, they charge you $2 a month," said Haji Ziaudin, a shopkeeper in Musa Qala district.

The Taliban have a multitude of ways to make money and to finance their local groups.

In the northeastern province of Badakhshan, a study last year found that the Taliban made as much as $6 million a year from illegal lapis lazuli mining. Then, there are taxes: up to $20 a year on water mills in their areas of control, and from $40 to $70 a year from electric mills. And one sheep per every 40 owned by farmers.

Just south of Kabul, the Taliban set up checkpoints, taxing vehicles transporting vegetables, according to residents. New York Times journalists saw copies of receipts the Taliban provided to drivers for vehicles they taxed.

In the western province of Ghor, farmers described paying taxes in cash and kind. Abdul Qayoum, 47, a potato farmer in Pasaband district, said he paid taxes to the Taliban twice a season, and two months ago had handed over about 220 pounds of potatoes.

"The reason we give tax to the Taliban is because we have to take our vegetables to the Dahane Jamal bazaar, which is the main market for us, and it is controlled by the Taliban," Mr. Qayoum said.

Sakhidad, 48, another resident of Pasaband, described how the Taliban had moved from an arbitrary system of collection, to a more ordered one enforced with strictness and fear.

When the Taliban first took over the district three years ago, Mr. Sakhidad said in an interview last year, all those who had worked for the government had to pay a fine. Then, they imposed a regular 10 percent tax on harvests.

Reached over the phone again recently, Mr. Sakhidad said that he continued to pay taxes to the Taliban and that he had given the new commander in the village $60 in taxes two months ago — a large sum for a farmer.

But he said he was relieved that the former Taliban commander in his village, Mullah Gul Agha, had been replaced. In one of his final acts, he said, Mullah Gul Agha pulled out his pistol and shot and killed a man who had protested paying his taxes, saying he had already paid one of the commander's associates, Mr. Sakhidad said.

"They force people to pay the taxes — it is not voluntary."

Inside The GOP Debate Over Strengthening Defense Spending, Despite The Cost

By Karoun Demirjian

Washington Post, January 28, 2017

On Friday, President Trump announced his plans to lavish spending on the nation's military in remarks at the Pentagon near Washington. But just one day beforehand, congressional Republicans debated the costs of such a buildup and how to pay for it at their annual policy retreat in Philadelphia.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chair Bob Corker was the most outspoken in questioning whether Republicans would be able to stomach making the kind of cuts necessary to fund a Republican wish list of new defense and foreign policy priorities.

"I'm sorry, I wonder sometimes where we as a party are going," Corker (R-Tenn.) told a roomful of House and Senate Republicans Thursday during a national security discussion, adding that he was "discouraged" by the apparent lip service being paid to the potential costs.

"There's a spending side of this that if we don't deal with, we're not going to come close to defending the needs of our country," he warned. "I fear that we're going to leave here without thinking of the other side of the equation."

Corker's remarks were part of a recording of several private sessions held this week at the GOP retreat in Philadelphia and later sent to The Washington Post and several other news outlets from an anonymous email address. The identities of the lawmakers in the recordings were verified by Post reporters.

Spokespeople for Corker, Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and House Armed Services Chair Mac Thornberry (Texas) — all of whom are heard in the recording — either did not return requests to comment or declined to comment for this story.

Republicans also fretted about the consequences of quickly repealing Obamacare, according to a recording of another closed session at the retreat; and Vice President Pence vowed that the administration would undertake an extensive examination of the voter rolls after Trump's claim that 3 to 5 million people voted illegally in the November election.

The conversation about defense spending among Hill Republicans reveals a potentially troublesome rift for the party between those who want to strengthen the military with more spending and the traditional stance of many Republicans that new spending needs to be paid for elsewhere in the budget. Trump made clear where he stands this week when he told Fox News's Sean Hannity that he wasn't worried about increasing the deficit by strengthening the military.

"Our military is more important to me than a balanced budget," President Trump told Hannity on Thursday.

In an executive order signed at the Pentagon on Friday, Trump signaled his intention to embark on a "great rebuilding of the Armed Forces," ordering a review of the military's war-readiness and the country's nuclear and ballistic missile defenses.

In order to pay for more defense spending, however, the GOP would first have to lift budget caps that were part of the 2011 Budget Control Act, or move new funding into a separate account for emergency war funding that isn't counted against the caps known as sequestration. Trump called for an end to the defense sequester on the campaign trail.

Corker began Thursday's session by challenging his colleagues to "prioritize within our own government" in order for the country to be successful on the world stage without going broke. But by the end of it, he questioned whether Republicans were willing to pay for a burgeoning military with major financial reforms to entitlement programs like Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security. Trump has said he does not intend to dip into those popular programs to fund his agenda.

"Unless we have the moral fortitude and courage to deal with the elephant in the room, all this other stuff we're talking about is a total waste of time," Corker said. "National security is our first responsibility, but leaving the nation greater for other people certainly is up there, and we're not willing to deal with this?"

Cornyn also appeared concerned about how to pay for a substantial military buildup without big cuts elsewhere, suggesting lifting the budget caps was insufficient.

Cornyn warned against trying "to deal with this by just tinkering around with sequestration. We're not going to just deal with this by tinkering around with overseas contingency spending," he said, referring to the emergency war funding measures lawmakers have relied on to cover some budgeting shortfalls over the last few years.

"Unless we deal with the 70 percent of spending that's mandatory spending…then we're never going to pick up enough money to be able to appropriate for what our national priorities are, starting with the military," Cornyn added.

GOP hawks in Congress have argued for years that the country needs to at least replenish defense spending lost because of across-the-board budget cuts. They point out that the cuts have cost the military in terms of the health and viability of its aircraft and ships, and the readiness of its members – particularly pilots, some of whom have been reduced to as little as four hours of training flights per month.

"I say to the defense doves…we need to negate the effects of the Budget Control Act," McCain said, according to the recording, calling the current way of funding the Pentagon "a disgrace."

"While we're dealing with our fiscal problems, there are men and women risking their lives to protect us and we have got to support them along the way,"said House Armed Services Committee Chair Mac Thornberry (R-Texas).

Some of the Republicans bemoaned the idea that the military's capacity shrunk during the course of former President Obama's tenure. They listed the threats to the United States as emanating chiefly from Russia, China, Iran, North Korea, and extremist groups such as the Islamic State, pointing to everything from nuclear strikes to cyber attacks. Cyber, McCain warned his colleagues, "is the one aspect of our potential confrontation where I believe that our adversaries are ahead of us."

The Republicans leaders expressed a great degree of confidence in Trump Cabinet appointees to steer defense and foreign policy, particularly Gen. James Mattis, who was recently confirmed as secretary of Defense; Rex Tillerson, who is likely to be confirmed by the Senate next week as secretary of state; and even Gen. Mike Flynn, Trump's pick to serve as National Security Adviser.

But not all of them are completely sold on Trump himself just yet.

"We have to have a little straight talk here. I don't know what the president's policy towards Russia is," McCain told his colleagues, stressing that Trump had to be tough on the Kremlin and Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"He is bent on restoring the Russian empire," McCain said of Putin to his colleagues. "He is a thug and a bully and we can't treat him any other way."

Troops Who Cleaned Up Radioactive Islands Can't Get Medical Care

By Dave Philipps

New York Times, January 28, 2017

When Tim Snider arrived on Enewetak Atoll in the middle of the Pacific Ocean to clean up the fallout from dozens of nuclear tests on the ring of coral islands, Army officers immediately ordered him to put on a respirator and a bright yellow suit designed to guard against plutonium poisoning.

A military film crew snapped photos and shot movies of Mr. Snider, a 20-year-old Air Force radiation technician, in the crisp new safety gear. Then he was ordered to give all the gear back. He spent the rest of his four-month stint on the islands wearing only cutoff shorts and a floppy sun hat.

"I never saw one of those suits again," Mr. Snider, now 58, said in an interview in his kitchen here as he thumbed a yellowing photo he still has from the 1979 shoot. "It was just propaganda."

Today Mr. Snider has tumors on his ribs, spine and skull — which he thinks resulted from his work on the crew, in the largest nuclear cleanup ever undertaken by the United States military.

Roughly 4,000 troops helped clean up the atoll between 1977 and 1980. Like Mr. Snider, most did not even wear shirts, let alone respirators. Hundreds say they are now plagued by health problems, including brittle bones, cancer and birth defects in their children. Many are already dead. Others are too sick to work.

The military says there is no connection between these illnesses and the cleanup. Radiation exposure during the work fell well below recommended thresholds, it says, and safety precautions were top notch. So the government refuses to pay for the veterans' medical care.

Congress long ago recognized that troops were harmed by radiation on Enewetak during the original atomic tests, which occurred in the 1950s, and should be cared for and compensated. Still, it has failed to do the same for the men who cleaned up the toxic debris 20 years later. The disconnect continues a longstanding pattern in which the government has shrugged off responsibility for its nuclear mistakes.

On one cleanup after another, veterans have been denied care because shoddy or intentionally false radiation monitoring was later used as proof that there was no radiation exposure.

A report by The New York Times last spring found that veterans were exposed to plutonium during the cleanup of a 1966 accident involving American hydrogen bombs in Palomares, Spain. Declassified documents and a recent study by the Air Force said the men might have been poisoned, and needed new testing.

But in the months since the report, nothing has been done to help them.

For two years, the Enewetak veterans have been trying, without success, to win medical benefits from Congress through a proposed Atomic Veterans Healthcare Parity Act. Some lawmakers hope to introduce a bill this year, but its fate is uncertain. Now, as new cases of cancer emerge nearly every month, many of the men wonder how much longer they can wait.

The cleanup of Enewetak has long been portrayed as a triumph. During the operation, officials told reporters that they were setting a new standard in safety. One report from the end of the cleanup said safety was so strict that "it would be difficult to identify additional radsafe precautions that could have been taken."

Documents from the time and interviews with dozens of veterans tell a different story.

Most of the documents were declassified and made publicly available in the 1990s, along with millions of pages of other files relating to nuclear testing, and sat unnoticed for years. They show that the government used troops instead of professional nuclear workers to save money. Then it saved even more money by skimping on safety precautions.

Records show that protective equipment was missing or unusable. Troops requesting respirators couldn't get them. Cut-rate safety monitoring systems failed. Officials assured concerned members of Congress by listing safeguards that didn't exist.

And though leaders of the cleanup told troops that the islands emitted no more radiation than a dental X-ray, documents show they privately worried about "plutonium problems" and areas that were "highly radiologically contaminated."

Tying any disease to radiation exposure years earlier is nearly impossible; there has never been a formal study of the health of the Enewetak cleanup crews. The military collected nasal swabs and urine samples during the cleanup to measure how much plutonium troops were absorbing, but in response to a Freedom of Information Act request, it said it could not find the records.

Hundreds of the troops, though, almost all now in their late 50s, have found one another on Facebook and discovered remarkably similar problems involving deteriorating bones and an incidence of cancer that appears to be far above the norm.

A tally of 431 of the veterans by a member of the group shows that of those who stayed on the southernmost island, where radiation was low, only 2 percent reported having cancer. Of those who worked on the most contaminated islands in the north, 20 percent reported cancer. An additional 34 percent from the contaminated islands reported other health problems that could be related to radiation, like failing bones, infertility and thyroid problems.

Between 1948 and 1958, 43 atomic blasts rocked the tiny atoll — part of the Marshall Islands, which sit between Hawaii and the Philippines — obliterating the native groves of breadfruit trees and coconut palms, and leaving an apocalyptic wreckage of twisted test towers, radioactive bunkers and rusting military equipment.

Four islands were entirely vaporized; only deep blue radioactive craters in the ocean remained. The residents had been evacuated. No one thought they would ever return.

In the early 1970s, the Enewetak islanders threatened legal action if they didn't get their home back. In 1972, the United States government agreed to return the atoll and vowed to clean it up first, a project shared by the Atomic Energy Commission, now called the Department of Energy, and the Department of Defense.

The biggest problem, according to Energy Department reports, was Runit Island, a 75-acre spit of sand blitzed by 11 nuclear tests in 1958. The north end was gouged by a 300-foot-wide crater that documents from the time describe as "a special problem" because of "high subsurface contamination."

The island was littered with a fine dust of pulverized plutonium, which if inhaled or otherwise absorbed can cause cancer years or even decades later. A millionth of a gram is potentially harmful, and because the isotopes have a half-life of 24,000 years, the danger effectively never goes away.

The military initially quarantined Runit. Government scientists agreed that other islands might be made habitable, but Runit would most likely forever be too toxic, memos show.

So federal officials decided to collect radioactive debris from the other islands and dump it into the Runit crater, then cap it with a thick concrete dome.

The government intended to use private contractors and estimated the cleanup would cost $40 million, documents show. But Congress balked at the price and approved only half the money. It ordered that "all reasonable economies should be realized" by using troops to do the work.

Safety planners intended to use protective suits, respirators and sprinklers to keep down dust. But without adequate funding, simple precautions were scrapped.

Paul Laird was one of the first service members to arrive for the atoll's cleanup, in 1977. Then a 20-year-old bulldozer driver, he began scraping topsoil that records show contained plutonium. He was given no safety equipment.

"That dust was like baby powder. We were covered in it," said Mr. Laird, now 60, during an interview in rural Maine, where he owns a small auto repair shop. “But we couldn’t even get a paper dust mask. I begged for one daily. My lieutenant said the masks were on back order so use a T-shirt.”

By the time Mr. Laird left the islands, he was throwing up and had a blisterlike rash. He got out of the Army in 1978 and moved home to Maine. When he turned 52, he found a lump that turned out to be kidney cancer. A scan at the hospital showed he also had bladder cancer. A few years later he developed a different form of bladder cancer.

His private health insurance covered the treatment, but co-payments left him deep in debt. He applied repeatedly for free veterans’ health care for radiation but was denied. His medical records from the military all said he had not been exposed.

“When the job was done, they threw my bulldozer in the ocean because it was so hot,” Mr. Laird said. “If it got that much radiation, how the hell did it miss me?”

As the cleanup continued, federal officials tried to institute safety measures. A shipment of yellow radiation suits arrived on the islands in 1978, but in interviews veterans said that they were too hot to wear in the tropical sun and that the military told them that it was safe to go without them.

The military tried to monitor plutonium inhalation using air samplers. But they soon broke. According to an Energy Department memo, in 1978, only a third of the samplers were working.

All troops were issued a small film badge to measure radiation exposure, but government memos note that humid conditions destroyed the film. Failure rates often reached 100 percent.

Every evening, Air Force technicians scanned workers for plutonium particles before they left Runit. Men said dozens of workers each day had screened positive for dangerous levels of radiation.

“Sometimes we’d get readings that were all the way to the red,” said one technician, David Roach, 57, who now lives in Rockland, Me.

None of the high readings were recorded, said Mr. Roach, who has since had several strokes.

Two members of Congress wrote to the secretary of defense in 1978 with concerns, but his office told them not to worry: Suits and respirators ensured the cleanup was conducted in “a manner as to assure that radiation exposure to individuals is limited to the lowest levels practicable.”

Even after the cleanup, many of the islands were still too radioactive to inhabit.

In 1988, Congress passed a law providing automatic medical care to any troops involved in the original atomic testing. But the act covers veterans only up to 1958, when atomic testing stopped, excluding the Enewetak cleanup crews.

If civilian contractors had done the cleanup and later discovered declassified documents that show the government failed to follow its own safety plan, they could sue for negligence. Veterans don’t have that right. A 1950 Supreme Court ruling bars troops and their families from suing for injuries arising from military service.

The veterans’ only avenue for help is to apply individually to the Department of Veterans Affairs for free medical care and disability payments. But the department bases decisions on old military records — including defective air sampling and radiation badge data — that show no one was harmed. It nearly always denies coverage.

“A lot of guys can’t survive anymore, financially,” said Jeff Dean, 60, who piloted boats loaded with contaminated soil.

Mr. Dean developed cancer at 43, then again two years later. He had to give up his job as a carpenter as the bones in his spine deteriorated. Unpaid medical bills left him $100,000 in debt.

“No one seems to want to admit anything,” Mr. Dean said. “I don’t know how much longer we can wait, we have guys dying all the time.”

New York City To Pay $8.2 Million Over Shooting By Off-Duty Officer

By Christopher Mele

New York Times, January 27, 2017

New York City will pay more than $8 million to settle a lawsuit stemming from an unprovoked drunken shooting by an off-duty police officer that seriously injured one man and traumatized another, the city confirmed on Friday.

Under the settlement, Joseph Felice of New Rochelle, N.Y., who was struck by gunfire six times, will receive $6.9 million and a friend of his, Robert Borrelli, who was with him during the shooting but not hit, will receive $1.3 million.

Settling the case was “in the best interests of the city,” a spokesman for the city’s Law Department said.

The shooting occurred on April 29, 2014, shortly before midnight, in Pelham, just north of the Bronx. The officer, Brendan Cronin, had been drinking alcohol — at least 10 drinks, by his own admission, including whiskey shots and beer, according to the lawsuit — at a bar on City Island after a day of tactical police training in the Bronx, officials said.

Mr. Borrelli, also of New Rochelle, was taking Mr. Felice to his home after they had played in a hockey game. They were stopped at a traffic light at the intersection of Sixth and Lincoln Avenues in Pelham when, in what an official at the time described as a “completely random” attack, Mr. Cronin fired at least 14 shots, hitting Mr. Felice six times in the back, shoulder, arm and chest.

One bullet remains lodged in Mr. Felice’s chest, and it was more than six months before he could sit in the front seat of a car as a passenger, according to the lawsuit. His lawyer, Randolph M. McLaughlin, said in an interview that his client had instructed him not to discuss his current medical condition.

In a statement, Mr. McLaughlin said, "Hopefully the city's settlement demonstrates the beginning of a zero-tolerance policy for alcohol abuse by its police officers, particularly when they are in possession of their service weapons or driving cars."

Mr. Cronin, a six-year veteran of the Police Department, pleaded guilty to attempted murder in 2015. He was sentenced to nine years in prison.

After Trump Criticism On Chicago Violence, Emanuel Touts Police Smarts

By Bill Ruthhart, Jeremy Gorner, Hal Dardick

Chicago Tribune, January 27, 2017

Two days after President Donald Trump told a national television audience that Mayor Rahm Emanuel needed to "smarten up and toughen up" on fighting gun violence, the mayor held a carefully orchestrated news conference to discuss Chicago's "smart-policing strategy."

As Emanuel summoned a swarm of cameras to the 7th District police station in Englewood on Friday to highlight new police cameras and gunshot tracking technology, sources said the Police Department's top brass was busy carrying out an order to flood the city's most violent neighborhoods with extra officers this weekend.

In a Tuesday night tweet in which he said he "will send in the Feds!" if the city doesn't fix its violent crime problems, Trump cited Chicago Tribune crime data that showed January homicides up 24 percent compared with 2016, a year marred by the highest number of killings in two decades. Trump again criticized Emanuel and the city's handling of gun violence in his first television interview as president Wednesday night, describing Chicago's rampant shootings as "horrible carnage" and "a problem that is very easily fixable."

Now, hundreds of additional Chicago police officers assigned to tactical, gang, saturation and mission teams have had their regular days off canceled from Friday through Sunday, according to police sources familiar with the change that was announced during a meeting at police headquarters. The city's beat officers also were given the option of earning overtime by working weekend days off, the sources said.

Adding so many officers to the street on their day off is more typical during hot summer months or special occasions such as when the president is visiting the city; is unusual for a cold-weather month such as January. This month has been marked by weekends with dozens of shootings, including 54 people shot last weekend alone.

Through Thursday, there had been 42 homicides so far with five days left in the month. In January 2016, there were 50 homicides. If the number of killings for January were to come in lower than last year, that would allow Emanuel to try to counter Trump's narrative of this year being off to an even worse start.

Chicago police spokesman Anthony Guglielmi said the staffing adjustment was unrelated to recent attention paid to Chicago's gun violence by the Republican president.

The mayor did not bring up the weekend staffing increase at his Friday news conference, instead focusing on technological advances the department is making in its two most violent police districts on the South and West sides — including the expansion of a gunshot detection system and crime cameras on the street along with new surveillance centers and new cellphones with software to instantly inform officers of shootings.

The mayor's announcement came to an abrupt end when police Superintendent Eddie Johnson grew faint and had to be helped to a chair, leading officers to call paramedics and escort reporters out of the room. On Friday night, Johnson said he had become lightheaded earlier in the day after taking blood pressure medication on an empty stomach, but he confirmed he's had a kidney disease for more than 30 years and is on a list waiting for a transplant.

While Johnson's health episode Friday came as a surprise, the rest of Emanuel's policing message for the day was scripted for public consumption.

Before Emanuel's arrival at the Englewood district, six police officers already were stationed at computers in a small, windowless room that featured four large flat-screen TVs on the wall. While a sign proclaimed the spot as a "viewing room," the Police Department's brass and the mayor's office called it the "Strategic Decision Support Center," which is staffed by a district intelligence officer who will incorporate the new technology with offender criminal history and crime data.

"The mayor is 10 minutes out, so if everyone could stage and get ready, all right? No pressure," Jonathan Lewin, CPD's deputy chief of bureau support services, told the room. "I need the officers who are going to meet the mayor in the lobby."

About 15 minutes later, Emanuel arrived through the station's back door and greeted the officers who were staffing the new "nerve center," as the mayor called it. "I'll be back," he told them. "They want me to do something."

Emanuel then made his way to the lobby, where 17 television cameras were recording as Emanuel and Johnson greeted the four officers — one each African-American, Asian, Latino and white — who had been waiting to participate in the prearranged shot.

After that photo op, the crush of cameras followed Emanuel into the tiny surveillance room, where Lewin walked Emanuel through the new technology as officers remotely zoomed in street cameras on license plates and explained how the gunshot tracking technology would allow officers to respond to a scene five minutes faster than from a 911 call.

"You can control the cameras from here?" Emanuel asked. "Yes," Lewin responded. "This is real time?" the mayor inquired. "Yes," was the answer again.

Much of what was discussed was difficult to hear, as the Police Department's media handlers barked orders to the TV photographers, who were being directed in and out of the room in shifts to record Emanuel's interest in the effort.

"Which screen are you looking at?" a photographer asked the mayor at one point.

"The one on the far left," Emanuel responded, pointing to a map of the 7th District that had labels for territory covered by various gangs, including the Gangster Disciples, Conservative Vice Lords, Mickey Cobras, Black P Stones, Black Disciples and Latin Kings. A second screen showed a "heat map of homicides." A third was streaming live street surveillance footage.

As Lewin explained how all the technologies eventually will be merged into one cohesive software system, Emanuel stopped him. "Do that again for me," the mayor said as the cameras rolled. "I'm slow."

Once Lewin finished his presentation, Emanuel headed upstairs to the district's roll call room, where he lauded the new technology, which he's paying for with money from unclaimed property tax rebates aimed at easing the pain from the record property tax increase he and aldermen approved.

"This allows our police officers to be all that much smarter and more effective in using technology and command ability to make sure people are in the right place at the right time to prevent a shooting in the first place," Emanuel said.

In a news release, Emanuel's office described the technology as part of the city's "smart-policing strategy," a term that had not been used in previous mayor's office announcements.

Less than 48 hours earlier, Trump had called Emanuel out on needing to run a smarter policing effort.

"It has been going on for years," Trump said of Chicago's rash of shootings and homicides. "So, all I'm saying is, to the mayor, who came up to my office recently, I say you have to smarten up and you have to toughen up, because you can't let that happen. That's a war zone. I want them to straighten out the problem. It's a big problem."

At the news conference, Emanuel was asked if there "was any coincidence" that his Friday announcement came after Trump's recent criticism.

"You don't put something like this together overnight," Emanuel replied. "It's about what's right for the future, not about any current event."

Trump's Vision Of 'Carnage' Misses Complex Reality Of Many Cities

By John Eligon

New York Times, January 28, 2017

PHILADELPHIA — As President Trump tells it, American cities are dangerous war zones. Bullets fly. Criminal aliens roam free. Mothers and children languish in poverty.

Mr. Trump perpetuated this grim vision — "carnage" is what he calls it — when he incorrectly told a gathering of Republicans here on Thursday that Philadelphia's murder rate had increased over the last year. He also took aim at violence in one of his favorite urban targets, Chicago, asking, "What the hell is going on?"

But the president's broad and cutting rhetoric fails to capture the complicated reality of urban America.

With declining crime, rising populations and growing innovation, cities in this country are prospering on many levels, albeit unevenly.

"Our streets are clean, always," said Isaiah Thomas, 32, cruising past the Dutch Colonials, Tudors and other well appointed homes in his predominantly black neighborhood on this city's northwest side. "Our neighbors in our community, we know each other and we get along. We got backyards, man. We go outside in our backyards and play. We go swimming. We got ballet lessons. We grew up playing instruments. We're doing the same things that most people do in the country."

Cities do remain places of segregation and enormous wealth gaps. Black and Latino families often bear more than their fair share of poverty, poor schools and violence. The number of people nationwide living in extremely poor neighborhoods has increased by about five million over roughly the last decade, according to a Brookings Institution study.

When Mr. Trump speaks about cities' problems, he focuses almost exclusively on these pockets of entrenched social ills.

Although Mr. Trump's assessment of cities is incomplete, he was "tapping into a level of outrage that we ought to have about our cities," said Lee Huang, the senior vice president of Econsult Solutions, an economic consulting firm based here. "Whether it's violence in Chicago, whether it's unemployment and poverty in Philadelphia, whether it is these structural and physical examples of blight and disinvestment and disparity, I don't think he's off in saying our cities have a lot of challenges," Mr. Huang said.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But Mr. Trump's critics say that by generalizing conditions in cities, he is sowing fears and solidifying stereotypes, which serves to divide the country.

"It never seems like he's talking in the context of saying, 'I want to help in these situations,'" said Lucas Leyden, 28, slurping a 16-ounce can of Miller High Life in a corner market converted into a bar in a gentrified neighborhood north of downtown. "It's always just disparaging remarks. 'This is bad!'"

During the campaign, when discussing issues of race, Mr. Trump often focused on what he considered inner cities, once saying that "African-Americans, Hispanics, are living in hell, because it's so dangerous."

Sulaiman Rahman, said he worried that by portraying the communities where minorities live as disastrous, Mr. Trump is trying to justify deploying aggressive policing tactics.

Just this week Mr. Trump said on Twitter that if local officials in Chicago could not control the rampant shooting there, "I will send in the Feds!"

"When he speaks and uses certain coded language, we kind of understand who he's talking about," said Mr. Rahman, who heads a professional network here. "You're framing it to justify a more detrimental agenda. That's the issue."

Although homicides in large cities in 2015 increased about 15 percent from 2014, they were still down 51 percent from two decades earlier, Richard Rosenfeld, a professor at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, said.

While murders did rise nearly 13 percent in Philadelphia from 2014 to 2015, they dipped slightly last year.

"Carnage doesn't describe the reality of crime in American cities," Mr. Rosenfeld said.

Mr. Trump's assessment of cities is rooted in the problems of segregation, discrimination and economic inequality that "urban progressives" have emphasized, argued Aaron Renn, a senior fellow in urban policy at the Manhattan Institute for Policy Research, a conservative think tank.

The president wants to correct those disparities, Mr. Renn said.

"I've never heard him once say, 'You're to blame for the problem,'" he said.

As Shanise Bolden, 26, strolled through her Northside neighborhood, Frankford, to her job working with the mentally ill, she had earbuds in her ear and carried her iPhone in a colorful case. A brown tote bag dangled from her wrist. Despite the high crime statistics in this part of town, she had little concern walking around here.

"Why would it be scary when we know each other?" she asked.

That sense of community and kinship belies the rough edges on Frankford's surface, residents say. It is something that people would never see or appreciate if they judged the community only by crime and economic statistics, they said.

It is a neighborhood of tightly packed rowhouses. An elevated train track cuts through the main drag, Frankford Avenue, which is jammed with convenience stores and cellphone shops, and storefronts boasting haircare products, clothes and pawned goods.

For all the Frankfords there are in cities, there are also many neighborhoods like Fishtown, about 15 minutes south. Once a tattered haven for drugs and other vices, it is now a place of nighttime joggers. It is common to see people with yoga mats slung over their shoulders, cycling in and out of a studio where a receptionist has to buzz them in. Corner stores that once peddled chips and candy have been replaced by bars with Skee-Ball machines and pool tables.

Gentrification has driven a lot of low-income residents to Frankford, and that sometimes leads to violence.

Leshay Davenport is not too worried, though. She recently strolled through a park behind the boxy, red brick public housing complex where she lives in Frankford, holding her 3-year-old daughter, Lyric, by the hand.

Ms. Davenport, 23, said she avoided certain parts of the neighborhood known for having a lot of riffraff. But having lived here for a decade, she said, she feels comfortable enough to let Lyric play outside.

"It's pretty good," she said. "The kids are friendly. There's not really too much violence. It's really a pretty friendly neighborhood."

The challenges of living in a place like Frankford are real, said Rasheed Ross, 18, a senior at Sankofa Freedom Academy.

Positive role models are hard to find, he said, and it is easy to get caught up in the wrong thing. A lot of people think their only avenues for success are rapping, basketball or dealing drugs, he said.

"It's hard and it's, at the same time, scary," he said. "You can get shot anywhere, at any time."

Yet Mr. Ross also described a nuanced reality. Most shootings stemmed from personal conflicts, he said. "It's not like somebody would just walk up to you and shoot you for no reason."

Fashion Police: Cops Ease Rules On Tattoos, Turbans, Beards

By Colleen Long

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

NEW YORK (AP) – The Joe Friday look is out. Tattoos, turbans and beards are in.

Police departments, compelled by a hiring crisis and eager for a more diverse applicant pool, are relaxing traditional grooming standards and getting away from rules that used to require a uniformly clean-shaven, 1950s look.

More officers are on the job with tattoos inked on their forearms, beards on their chins or religious head coverings like hijabs and turbans in place of – or tucked beneath – their blue caps.

"My turban is a part of me," said Mandeep Singh, among 160 Sikhs in the New York City Police Department who last month were allowed to wear navy blue turbans in place of the standard-issue police caps. "This opens a gate for other potential candidates who felt they could not be a police officer because they would have to choose either the job or their faith."

That followed a 2014 move by the St. Paul, Minnesota, police to create a special hijab for its first female Somali Muslim officer.

Muslim NYPD officer Masood Syed, who grows a beard for religious reasons, was suspended for its length and sued his department last year over a rule requiring beards to be trimmed to within a millimeter of the skin. As a result, the department changed the length to a half-inch and reinstated him. Syed's suit is still pending, though, because he said the length is arbitrary and it should be case by case, depending on the officer's needs.

"It's 2017," Syed said. "The police department is supposed to reflect the community that it's policing."

Many departments say it's tougher to attract candidates to a physically demanding job that offers low pay and is under increasingly intense public scrutiny. That has led many to make a nod to shifting fashion trends, particularly among millennials, and ease longstanding bans on beards and visible tattoos.

New Orleans; Portland, Oregon; Austin, Texas; and Pinellas Park, Florida, are among the departments that look the other way if a recruit comes in with visible tattoos.

"Modern practice is colliding with dress codes," said Will Aitchison, an attorney who represents police unions during labor-related disputes. "And what police departments really should be focused on is how the officer performs his or her job, as opposed to how they look."

In Kansas, state police did a public survey on whether officers should be allowed to have tattoos to help determine whether to change their policy after they couldn't fill about 100 trooper jobs.

Half of the nearly 20,000 respondents had tattoos themselves. Sixty-nine percent said the department shouldn't have a policy prohibiting visible tattoos.

"We were surprised by the response," said Lt. Adam Winters. "It just doesn't seem to bother people."

Still, the department's prohibition on visible tattoos has stayed in place, in part because of the potential challenge of regulating the content of tattoos that might be offensive.

In Philadelphia, the department is considering tightening its policy after photos surfaced last fall of an officer in uniform with a tattoo on his forearm showing a Nazi symbol: a spread-winged eagle under the word "Fatherland."

In Chicago, a federal judge threw out a lawsuit filed by tattooed officers – all military veterans – who objected to a new requirement that they wear long sleeves to cover up their inked arms during a sweltering Midwestern summer. The judge argued it would be too difficult for departments to determine what would be considered offensive and need to be covered.

But, the police brass recently started allowing them again – they said as a morale booster for a beleaguered force.

After Roof Trial, SC Addressing Faith, Violence Intersection

By Meg Kinnard

Associated Press, January 28, 2017

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) – The federal trial of the South Carolina man who slaughtered nine Bible study participants has come and gone, with Dylann Roof's death sentence assuring he will spend the rest of his limited days in custody.

But the June 2015 shootings at Emanuel AME continue to prompt a conversation about the uneasy intersection of faith and gun violence, as thousands of worshippers around South Carolina gather this weekend to memorialize crime victims and call for reform.

It isn't just the church slaughter that has sounded the alarm bells. The Center for American Progress found South Carolina ranked sixth in the nation for the overall rate of gun violence, noting someone was killed with a gun in the state roughly every 13 hours.

Events throughout the state are part of Stand Up Sunday, launched last year by a group meeting in the very room where the Rev. Clementa Pinckney and eight others were gunned down as they prayed. Pinckney's lifelong best friend, fellow AME Pastor Kylon Middleton, is now heading the group he says provides an opportunity for people of faith to stand up for those they've lost and talk about real solutions to problems of gun violence.

Middleton was recently chosen to head the board for Arm-In-Arm: South Carolinians for Responsible Gun Ownership, a grassroots group of more than 1,200 faith leaders, gun owners, teachers and others across South Carolina that is coordinating the weekend's events. What they all have in common, Middleton says, is a desire to find ways to cut down on gun violence.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Prosecutors who secured a death sentence against Roof argued the 22-year-old white supremacist researched and picked his victims because, as loyal, churchgoing folk, he figured they'd be less likely to resist his attack. He fired his first shot at Pinckney as the worshippers closed their eyes in the evening's final prayer.

Stand Up Sunday isn't about encouraging people to arm themselves as they worship, although the group counts among its members people who have purchased weapons and practiced using them in real-life situations. This weekend, congregants are signing petitions and talking about ways to cut down on violent gun deaths in South Carolina.

At Charleston's Mt. Zion AME, where Middleton is pastor, the altar will be decorated with white crosses bearing the names of South Carolina gun violence victims, whose names will be read aloud in Sunday's service. Choir members will sing a song specially written to talk about gun violence in South Carolina.

"It allows us the opportunity to articulate their story and to give them a space to at least publicly be acknowledged in their grief, and to move the pendulum in another direction toward activism," Middleton told The Associated Press recently.

Roof, who was sentenced to death last month in a federal trial, should never have been able to purchase a gun because of a prior drug arrest. But authorities later told The Associated Press that, due to a combination of errors, Roof managed to buy one anyway.

Victims' families are suing the FBI for negligence in allowing the sale. FBI Director James Comey has said Roof should have never been allowed to buy the gun and promised a full review.

Advocates for tighter gun regulations have pushed for more days to be added onto South Carolina's three-day waiting period, but that legislation has failed. There are several bills pending in South Carolina's recently reconvened Legislature dealing with guns, including a measure that would require a national instant background check before sales, exchanges or transfers.

Gerald Malloy, a former Senate colleague of Pinckney's and also his personal friend, has made such a proposal this year.

Existing laws, Middleton said, "are useless unless the gaps in our existing background system are fixed."

Leading DHS News:

ADMINISTRATION FLOATS MEXICO IMPORT TAX AS PEÑA NIETO CANCELS MEETING WITH TRUMP. Coverage of the US-Mexico border wall debate focuses on the Administration's floating of a 20 percent import tax and on Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto's cancellation of his scheduled meeting with President Trump, with the President's own remarks on the wall at the Republican retreat in Philadelphia getting less attention. The coverage remains mostly negative, with many reports stating that an import tax would put the cost burden on Americans, not on Mexico.

ABC World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 4:10, Muir, 14.63M) opened with "the showdown over the wall. President Trump telling us just 24 hours ago that Americans will pay at first, but Mexico will pay us back. Tonight, the Mexican president saying that won't happen. And there is new fallout: President Peña Nieto's visit to the White House next week, now canceled." ABC's Jonathan Karl: "Mexico may insist it's not going to happen, but today Donald Trump was as defiant as ever." Trump: "I've said many times that the American people will not pay for the wall. And I have made that clear to the government of Mexico." During an interview with Fox News' Hannity (1/26, 535K), the President said, "The wall is necessary. It's not just politics."

The CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 2:45, Pelley, 11.17M) reported, "It's become a chaotic first week for the Trump Administration. Late today, the President's press secretary told reporters that Mr. Trump never said the Mexican government would pay for the wall. Earlier, he announced a 20 percent tax on Mexican goods, and then the White House arranged a hasty news conference to knock that down. This morning, Mr. Trump insulted the president of Mexico with a tweet, and now their summit meeting in Washington is off."

NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 3:00, Holt, 16.61M) reported, "President Trump's plan to build a wall on the Mexican border is potentially running up against its own walls as he looks for ways to pay for it that don't leave Americans on the hook. The President's insistence that Mexico will foot the bill has now antagonized the Mexican president to the point of calling off next week's scheduled face-to-face meeting." NBC's Hallie Jackson: "Late this afternoon, the Administration floating an idea to slap a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports – a way to fund the estimated $8 billion to $14 billion wall, but under that plan it would be Americans who would probably end up paying more for imports like cars, fruits and vegetables, and alcohol. In effect, footing the bill themselves."

Fox News Special Report (1/26, 1.53M) said, "It only took four days of his first official working week but...Trump is already deeply embroiled in his very first diplomatic spat." CNN's Situation Room (1/26, 554K) reported that "some top Republicans are growing increasingly concerned about the President's policies towards Mexico," including the "recent proposal by the White House to impose a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports."

The AP (1/26, Pace) reports that Trump, speaking at a Republican retreat in Philadelphia, called on the GOP "to help him enact 'great and lasting change'...at a party retreat Thursday but offered few details. Later his spokesman said the president will seek a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports to pay for a proposed border wall." Bloomberg Politics (1/26, Sink, 201K) reports that Sean Spicer told reporters, "When you look at the plan that's taking shape now, using comprehensive tax reform as a means to tax imports from countries that we have a trade deficit from, like Mexico, if you tax that $50 billion at 20 percent of imports, by doing that we can do $10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone." However, the AP says Spicer later "tried to take back his earlier comments by saying the 20 percent tax is one of several options under consideration and Trump hasn't settled on it as the way to recoup construction costs for building the wall."

The Hill (1/26, Fabian, 1.25M) also says Spicer "sought to clarify his earlier comments about the plan, saying they were not meant to be an official policy rollout." He said, "Our job right now isn't to roll something out or be prescriptive. It's to show that there are ways that the wall could be paid for. Full stop. That's it." Politico (1/26, Nussbaum, 2.46M) headlines a report "Trump Team Walks Back Plan To Fund Wall With Import Tax."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Memoli, 4.52M) says that "although Trump repeatedly has said that Mexico would pay for the wall," such a tax "actually would fall on U.S. consumers, not on Mexicans." USA Today (1/26, Korte, Jackson, 5.28M) says Spicer "gave few details, and described it as a beginning of a process that would be part of overall tax reform." The Washington Post (1/26, Partlow, Rucker, 11.43M) calls the tax proposal "a stunning new detail," and says Trump's moves "have rekindled old resentments in Mexico, a country that during its history has often felt bullied and threatened by its wealthier, more powerful neighbor."

The New York Daily News (1/26, Joseph, 4.45M) says Trump would also need to formally pull the US out of NAFTA to implement such a tax, since the trade agreement "bans unilateral decisions on new taxes and tariffs between the countries." The New York Times (1/26, Bradsher, Abrams, Vlasic, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), in an examination of the prospect of broader import taxes, says "linking the plan to Mexico left corporate groups mostly silent, leery of offending the president by criticizing him but also leery of offending Americans who dislike Mr. Trump's denunciations of Mexico and Mexican immigrants."

The New York Times (1/26, Shear, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), the Washington Times (1/26, Dinan, 272K), and US News & World Report (1/26, Soergel, 1.02M) also report on the prospects for a Mexican import tax. The New York Times (1/26, Porter, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) also examines other ways to "make Mexico pay" for the wall, including "impounding remittances of Mexicans working in the United States, or charging Mexicans more for visas." But in terms of the former, "Mexicans would come up with other conduits to send the $100 a week that their parents, children or siblings back home rely on to pay the bills," and taxing remittances "might be illegal...as discriminatory on the basis of national origin."

John Hay Professor of International Studies at Brown University's Watson Institute Peter Andreas argues in an op-ed for the Washington Post (11/21, Graff, 11.43M) Monkey Cage that Trump will build the wall and "it may be one of his biggest political successes." Because much of the wall is already built – "Trump's predecessors carefully avoided calling any new border barriers a 'wall,'" Andreas says "regardless of what Trump ends up building, calling it a 'wall' will sound like something new and make his followers cheer."

The USA Today (1/26, 5.28M) Editorial Board argues Trump's wall "has all the hallmarks of a multibillion dollar boondoggle." Because "most of California, Arizona and New Mexico already have some kind of barrier," combined with declines in illegal immigrants, USA Today argues "Trump's wall would be a colossal waste of money." Additionally, the contention about who will foot the bill could potentially "set off a mutually destructive trade war and effectively make U.S. consumers pick up the tab."

Sources offering additional coverage include the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Córdoba, Nicholas, Subscription Publication, 6.37M), Reuters (1/26, Rampton, Chiacu, Heavey), the New York Times (1/26, Irwin, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Newsweek (1/26, Cadei, 862K), Public Radio International (1/26, 36K), ABC News (1/26, Marshall, Siegel, 3.09M), Philly (PA) (1/26, TAYLOR, CALDWELL, 942K), the Washington (DC) Post (1/26, Snell, 11.43M), the AP (1/26, Taylor, Caldwell), and the AP (1/26, Spagat, Watson) in a second article.

Nieto Cancels Meeting, Blasts Plans For Border Wall. President Trump's move to begin planning the border wall with Mexico continued to receive widespread television coverage, as did suggestions from the White House that Mexico could pay for the wall through a tax on the country's imports to the US. Coverage tended to criticize that suggestion, with several officials saying such a tax would end up hurting Americans.

In its lead story, ABC World News Tonight (1/26, lead story, 4:10, Muir, 14.63M) reported Mexican President Enrique Nieto on Wednesday announced he is canceling a planned visit to the White House next week after President Trump on Tuesday signed an executive order to move forward with plans to build a border wall. Hours after Trump told ABC that the US would initially pay for the wall and later be reimbursed by Mexico, Nieto addressed the American people, saying, “I’ve said it once and again. ... Mexico offers and demands respect as the sovereign nation we are.” After Nieto’s cancellation, Trump “insisted” it was a mutual decision. Trump: “The President of Mexico and myself have agreed to cancel our planned meeting scheduled for next week. Unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless, and I want to go a different route.”

CNN’s Anderson Cooper 360 (1/26, 686K) said Nieto announced the canceled meeting on Twitter.

NBC Nightly News (1/26, lead story, 3:00, Holt, 16.61M) said in its lead story that Mexico is “clearly agitated,” because apart from Nieto’s cancellation, Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray “abruptly cancell[ed] his own visit to the Homeland Security Department today. An agency official telling the NBC News, he simply drove past the entrance without stopping.” When Trump told lawmakers at a Republican retreat about not meeting with Nieto, “he was met with silence,” with one lawmaker telling NBC that “the President needs to be careful to keep a friendly relationship with one of our key allies, closest trading partners, and our nearest neighbor.”

Fox News’ Special Report (1/26, 1.53M) said, “It only took four days of his first official working week but...Trump is already deeply embroiled in his very first diplomatic spat. It began last night when...Nieto publicly scolded President Trump.” Nieto was shown saying, “I am saddened and against the decision by the United States to continue with the construction of a wall that for years, far from joining us, has divided us.” In its lead story, the CBS Evening News (1/26, lead story, 2:45, Pelley, 11.17M) similarly reported that in a new addition to the “chaotic first week for the Trump Administration,” Trump “insulted the President of Mexico with a tweet, and now their summit meeting in Washington is off.” According to Margaret Brennan, White House press secretary Sean Spicer “said a 20 percent tax on imports [from Mexico] would generate enough money” for Mexico to pay for the wall. However, White House chief of staff Reince Priebus later said the import tax was just “one of a buffet of options,” and “aides said the tax could range from five percent to 20 percent.”

Manu Raju reported on CNN’s Situation Room (1/26, 554K) that “some top Republicans are growing increasingly concerned about the President’s policies towards Mexico,” including the “recent proposal by the White House to impose a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports.” GOP Sen. John Cornyn was shown saying, “I don’t see any benefit in trying to crawl back into our shell as a country. We can’t do that economically. We’re obviously next door to Mexico. As I frequently tell my friends in Mexico, I said, ‘We can’t get a divorce. We need to figure out how to make this marriage work.’” CNN’s Situation Room (1/26, 554K) reported that the 20 percent tax on Mexican imports drew immediate push back from Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain, and now the White House is “starting to walk that back,” with Spicer “saying this is just one thing they’re looking at.”

Manuel Bojorquez said on the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 2, 2:20, Pelley, 11.17M) that while Trump has said the entire wall would cost $8 billion to $12 billion, “analysts say it could hit $40 billion.” Bojorquez added that there are also “practical challenges, like building on private lands, over remote mountains, and on national parks.” Dennis Nixon, one of the Trump campaign’s top fundraisers in Texas, opposes the wall, and says that those who supported Trump on the notion that he’d build it are “wrong. Because they have not looked at the data.”

Appearing on CNN’s Situation Room (1/26, 554K), Sen. Robert Menendez said plans for the wall and the proposed tax on Mexican imports represents “a major, major challenge to the US-Mexico relationship which is important to us in so many different dimensions.” He said Trump’s vow that Mexico will pay for the wall is “just impossible to accept for the President of Mexico and the Mexican people,” adding that he is worried that it could start a trade war because Mexico could respond to the import tax by implementing a “20 percent [tax] on the $267 billion that the United States sells in goods and services to their country. Those are goods and services made by Americans here. Jobs in the United States. And at the end of the day, if that’s what’s going to happen, American workers suffer.” Menendez later added (1/26, 554K), “I don’t believe the taxpayers of the United States should spend nearly $20 billion dollars on...the great wall of hate, at the end of the day when that 20 billion could be spent far better in creating educational opportunity, in creating jobs, in a whole host of things that are important to our country.”

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Tony Wayne, the US Ambassador to Mexico under President Obama, told CNN's Situation Room (1/26, 554K) that while Mexico is "quite willing" to discuss a "range of issues" to find "agreeable" ways to move forward, the prospect of a wall is a "very emotional issue" and Trump's proposal is "seen as a sign of disrespect and an issue of national dignity."

Appearing on CNN's Situation Room (1/26, 554K), Mark Zandi, the chief economist at Moody's Analytics, said there is "nothing positive" about the idea of a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports. He explained that such a tax "would be paid by American consumers in the form of higher prices for everything that we import from Mexico." Zandi suggested that the Administration look at the 1930s when legislation was passed to increase tariffs on imported products that lead to the great depression. He stressed that he wasn't "suggesting we're going into the great depression...but that's pretty instructive."

Politico (1/26, Nelson, 2.46M) reports counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway said on NBC's "Today" on Thursday that "it is 'high time' that the U.S. spend money protecting its own border." She added, "President Trump has been very clear and consistent on this point, Matt. He's going to build the wall, Mexico will pay for it. Whether they pay for it straight-out, or it's reimbursed later on after congressional funding."

Jennifer Rubin writes in her Right Turn blog for the Washington (DC) Post (1/26, Rubin, 11.43M) to describe ten "huge flaws in Trump's immigration directives," arguing that much of the hysteria is "unrelated to actual border conditions" and that a physical wall will be "duplicative, ineffective and unnecessary."

Meeting Cancellation Latest Sign Of Quick "Souring Of Relations." The AP (1/26, Stevenson) reports that Peña Nieto's cancellation of the visit signaled "a remarkable souring of relations between Washington and one of its most important international partners just days into" the Trump Administration. The rift "capped days of increasingly confrontational remarks – on Twitter and in dueling public appearances – between" Trump and Peña Nieto.

Trump tweeted at 8:51 a.m. Thursday, "The U.S. has a 60 billion dollar trade deficit with Mexico. It has been a one-sided deal from the beginning of NAFTA with massive numbers of jobs and companies lost. If Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting." Three hours later, Peña Nieto tweeted that the meeting was cancelled, adding in a subsequent tweet that Mexico remains interested in negotiations.

The New York Times (1/26, Ahmed, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says Trump's wall announcement "escalated into a diplomatic standoff" as Peña Nieto cancelled the meeting and Trump accused Mexico "of burdening the United States with illegal immigrants, criminals and a trade deficit. ... Having called for dialogue in the face of Mr. Trump's vows to build a wall during the American presidential campaign, Mr. Peña Nieto ultimately bowed to public pressure in Mexico to respond more forcefully to his northern neighbor."

However, the Washington Times (1/26, Miller, 272K) reports that Trump told Republicans that he and Peña Nieto mutually agreed to cancel the meeting. Trump said, "[We] have agreed to cancel our planned meeting scheduled for next week. Such a meeting would be fruitless. ... The world has taken advantage of us for many years. It's not going to happen anymore." The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Memoli, 4.52M) reports that Trump also told the GOP legislators, "The American people will not pay for the wall. It is time that the American people had a president fighting as hard for its citizens as other countries do for theirs. And that is exactly what I'm going to do for you."

In an analysis, the Washington Post (1/26, Deyoung, Rucker, 11.43M) says that in his first days in office, Trump began "to reshape the U.S. role in the world, laying the groundwork, in a series of planned and signed executive actions and statements, for the 'America first' foreign policy on which he campaigned."

The Hill (1/26, Fabian, 1.25M) says that the cancellation "escalates brewing tensions" between the US and Mexico. USA Today (1/26, Agren, 5.28M) and the NPR (1/26, Kennedy, 1.92M) website also have brief reports on the cancellation.

Congressional GOP Expects Wall Spending Request Of Up To $15 Billion. USA Today (1/26, Kelly, 5.28M) reports, "Congressional leaders said Thursday they expect the Trump administration to send them a request soon for $12 billion to $15 billion to fund construction of a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border." Senate Majority Leader McConnell said, "We intend to address the wall issue ourselves." House Speaker Ryan said Congress "will take up President Trump's expected request before the end of September...in the form of an emergency budget request" separate from the regular federal spending bill. The Washington Post (1/26, Sullivan, 11.43M) reports that the GOP leaders "declined to specify where that funding would come from, continuing the uncertainty over one of President Trump's signature campaign promises." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Rubin, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) notes that congressional Republicans floated an import tax several weeks ago, but Trump criticize it at the time.

WPost, WSJournal Say Trump Has Launched Trade War With Mexico. The Washington Post (1/26, 11.43M) editorializes, "Until a few days ago, the U.S.-Mexico relationship was a strong one that benefited both countries. In the first week of his term, President Trump seems determined to change that – and for no good reason." The Post urges Administration officials to "reach out and seek to repair the week's damage. It took the United States nearly a decade to recover from the economic wreckage of the last recession. A wealth-destroying trade war with one of America's closest partners would threaten that long-sought recovery."

In an editorial headlined "Trump's Little Mexican War," the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) says Trump has sparked a diplomatic crisis and put an important economic relationship at risk, and says Trump forced Peña Nieto into a position where negotiation was not possible.

Border Wall Tax On Mexican Crude Would Make US Drivers Pay More. Bloomberg Politics (1/26, 201K) reports US consumers would likely pay more for gasoline if President Donald Trump passes a 20 percent border wall tax to finance the construction of the barrier along the border between US and Mexico. Domestic refiners that rely on Mexican crude would most likely pass their additional costs on to the consumer. Press Secretary Sean Spicer noted the tax was only one idea being considered for how to pay for the wall. The tax would apply to countries with which the US has a trade deficit, thereby excluding Canada, but may include Saudi Arabia, the second largest foreign supplier of crude to the US.

The Detroit (MI) Free Press (1/26, Snavely, Korte, Spangler, 1.01M) reports similarly, explaining that "several automotive executives have said that the costs of a steep border tariff could be offset by Trump's plan to lower corporate taxes and relax fuel economy and other regulations," while "Wall Street analysts estimate a tariff could raise prices of vehicles from Mexico by $2,300."

Immigration Crackdown Draws Opposition, Support From Activists. According to the Los Angeles (CA) Times (1/26, Carcamo, Smith, 4.52M), Trump's crackdown on illegal immigration has "won praise from activists who for years have been trying to reduce illegal immigration," including Claremont anti-illegal immigration organization We The People Rising. The organization's executive director, Robin Hvidston, "said Trump's actions bring new hope to activists like her," arguing that "Ending sanctuary cities is a way to restore the rule of law to the cities of California and throughout the United States. ... We … are happy and encouraged that, after decades of federal lawbreaking, a president is finally taking action to enforce federal immigration laws."

Dan Stein, president of non-profit Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors more restrictive immigration policies, argues in a USA Today (1/26, Stein, 5.28M) op-ed that, although the US-Mexico relationship "is important," the "integrated border and interior enforcement strategy will restore our national footing as a nation that will enforce its laws and protect the public interest."

The Orange County (CA) Register (1/25, Kwong, 690K) reports on Thursday, “several dozen immigrants rights activists” assembled at the US Citizenship and Immigration Services field office in Santa Ana, California, to protest President Trump’s executive orders. Mirvette Judeh Maaytah, vice chairwoman of the Arab American Civic Council, said the orders are “un-American,” while Roberto Herrera, of Resilience OC, pledged to “push [sanctuary] ordinances across other cities.”

The Detroit Free Press (1/26, Warikoo, 1.01M) reports that in Michigan, “many undocumented immigrants and their children worry after Trump announced” the new executive orders to “crack down on them and punish cities that seek to protect them.” The paper profiles a young woman, the mother of three children, who came to the US as a child, and is a Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals recipient. So, “she joined a wide range of immigrant and minority groups” criticizing the orders, saying they “unfairly target immigrants and Muslims.” Another protester said, “this is about demonizing vulnerable families to score cheap political points.” In response, “local community and religious leaders vowed to push back against his plans.”

Attorneys Warn Immigrants To Stay Put. The Huffington Post (1/26, Foley, 237K) reports “immigration attorneys and advocacy groups said they were being inundated with questions from people legally in the U.S. wondering whether it would be safe for them to travel” in response to reports that Trump may sign an executive order temporarily stopping travel from majority-Muslim countries. According to the Post, “All of them, lawyers are advising, should stay put” because, “with Trump, you cannot take any risks.”

Tohono O’Odham Nation To Trump: Build Wall “Over My Dead Body.” The Guardian (UK) (1/26, Levin, 4.07M) reports the federally recognized Tohono O’odham Nation Native American tribe, which has “a reservation that spans 75 miles of the US-Mexico border, announced on Thursday that it does not support the wall and criticized the White House for signing an executive order without consulting the tribe.” The tribe called for a meeting with Trump in the statement, which “comes after a tribal vice-chairman declared the government would build the wall ‘over my dead body.’”

TRUMP EXPLAINS RESTRICTIONS ON IMMIGRANTS FROM COUNTRIES WITH HISTORY OF TERRORISM. President Trump was asked on Fox News’ Hannity (1/26, 535K) about his executive orders on Syria, Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, and Yemen. Trump said, “Beyond just those countries. ... We are going to have extreme vetting for people coming into our country and if we think there is a problem, it is not going to be so easy for people to come in anymore.” Trump added, “We have taken in tens of thousands of people. We know nothing about them. They can say they vet them. They didn’t vet them. They have no papers. How can you vet somebody when you don’t know anything about them and you have no papers? ... You can’t.”

USA Today (1/26, Jackson, 5.28M) reports President Trump said that he is not putting in place a “ban” on migration by Muslims, but is placing “restrictions on entry from countries with a history of terrorism.” White House spokesman Sean Spicer said the rules have “not been decided yet,” but critics are already saying “they will block law-abiding Muslims” from immigrating.

The Washington Post (1/26, Raghavan, Loveluck, Sieff, 11.43M) reports the President’s “executive order to tighten the vetting of potential immigrants and visitors to the United States...will shatter countless dreams and divide families,” according to “immigrants and human rights activists.” The Post says that Yemen, Iraq, Syria, Somalia, Iran, Libya, and Sudan would be immediately effected. Denise Bell of Amnesty International said it would be “devastating,” adding that it would be “violating international law.” Suzanne Akhras Sahloul, founder of the Syrian Community Network, said, “these people are escaping the very same terrorism that Trump says he’s banning them for.” The paper focuses on people who have been going through years-long processes to immigrate who now believe they will not be able to.

Iranian Actress To Boycott Oscars In Protest Of Visa Ban. The New York Times (1/26, Donadio, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Iranian actress Taraneh Alidoosti, who stars in “The Salesman” – which “is up for the foreign-language Academy Award,” said on Thursday that “she would boycott the Oscars ceremony to protest President Trump’s announcement that he would issue a temporary ban on visas to citizens from seven predominantly Muslim countries.” She tweeted, “Trump’s visa ban for Iranians is racist. TRUMP PREPARED TO BLOCK SYRIAN REFUGEES, SET UP SAFE ZONES IN SYRIA. In a report on Syrian refugee families who recently escaped Aleppo to live in the US, the CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Muir, 11.17M) said that President Trump, citing security, "is expected to block refugees from Syria." Trump has also called for the creation of safe zones in Syria, reported Fox News' Special Report (1/26, 1.53M), as one of the "key provisions" in a "sweeping series of measures the President says will help defend America against terrorism." Other provisions include a "30-day ban on most visa entries from nations that are hotbeds of terrorism," while refugee admissions are also expected to be "reduced by 50 percent." Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/26, 767K) reported that Trump will sign an executive order "suspending all immigration for 30 days from Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, and Yemen until a new vetting system can be adopted."

Fox News' Special Report (1/26, 1.53M) reported White House spokesman Sean Spicer also said the State Department "is going to withhold visas and other tools to make sure countries accept and return the criminals that came from their country." While also reporting that one of Trump's executive orders cracks down on sanctuary cities for undocumented immigrants, NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 6, 2:10, Holt, 16.61M) said, "Nationwide, there are no concrete numbers on how many violent crimes are committed by undocumented immigrants. Now, a court battle is brewing over whether President Trump's order is legal."

Albright Pledges To Register As Muslim In Solidarity. USA Today (1/26, Rossman, 5.28M) reports former US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright on Wednesday tweeted that she is prepared to register as a Muslim, joining "thousands of people who have pledged to register as a Muslim" in response to "Trump's support of a Muslim registry on the campaign trail." Albright also tweeted her support for refugees, saying, "There is no fine print on the Statue of Liberty. America must remain open to people of all faiths & backgrounds. #RefugeesWelcome."

Law Professor: US Already Tried "Extreme Vetting" For Muslims. UCLA School of Law professor and UCLA Center for Near Eastern Studies director Asli Ü. Bâli argues in a Washington Post (1/26, Bâli, 11.43M) op-ed that the US has already tried "extreme vetting" tactics on immigrants – including the "recently discontinued Bush-era" National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS) program, which failed "to achieve its avowed goals." NSEERS required "male noncitizens over the age of 16 traveling to or present in the United States from 24 Arab- or Muslim-majority countries (plus North Korea)" to register and "be fingerprinted, photographed and interrogated." Bâli argues that federal courts, which "found the NSEERS program constitutional," may come to a "different conclusion if new programs were shown to be based on religious animus."

TRUMP ORDERS DHS TO PRODUCE LIST OF SANCTUARY CITIES. The Washington Times (1/26, Dinan, 272K) reports Wednesday, President Trump ordered the Homeland Security Department to develop and release "a name-and-shame list of sanctuary cities" as part of "two new executive orders erasing decades of previous immigration enforcement policy." According to US Immigration and Customs Enforcement, there are 279 cities and counties that "refused to cooperate on at least some deportations in 2016."

DHS SAYS REFUGEE INTERVIEW TRIPS DELAYED, NOT CANCELED. Reuters (1/26, Torbati) reports the Department of Homeland Security has temporarily ceased staff trips to interview refugees abroad as it anticipates likely policy changes by President Trump, according to two sources with knowledge of the decision. Reuters says the move "effectively amounts to a pause in future refugee admissions," because the interviews "are a crucial step in an often years-long process."

The AP (1/26) reports spokeswoman Gillian Christensen for the Department of Homeland Security said that "trips have not been officially canceled" for officials traveling to conduct refugee interviews, though they have been delayed. The AP cites a State Department officials who indicated the travel suspension is effective until February 15.

The delay, however, "effectively pauses future refugee admissions amid speculation that President Trump may drastically change US refugee policy," The Hill (1/26, Hensch, 1.25M) reports, citing Reuters.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Newsweek (1/26, Reuters, 862K) reports the possibility of future admissions delay, with President Trump "expected to sign an executive order that would include a temporary ban on all refugees, and a suspension of visas for citizens of Syria and six other Middle Eastern and African countries."

CNN (1/26, Mallonee, 29.79M) provides similar coverage.

OPPONENT OF BIRTHRIGHT CITIZENSHIP MAY JOIN DHS IN IMMIGRATION-RELATED POSITION. The Washington Post (1/26, Hsu, 11.43M) reports that "two former US officials informed of transition changes by department personnel" say Center for Immigration Studies policy analyst Jon D. Feere, a "prominent advocate of ending US birthright citizenship is in line to join the Trump administration in an immigration-related position at the Department of Homeland Security." The Post says Feere "testified before the House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration in 2015 and has written several opinion pieces...proposing alternatives to a constitutional amendment by which Congress could enact a law or President Trump could issue an executive order denying citizenship, US passports or Social Security numbers to American-born children of people in the country illegally."

CONTINUING COVERAGE: DHS IG LOOKING INTO ALLEGED GEORGIA SECRETARY OF STATE BREACH. Fox News (1/26, Hickey, 11.07M) reports the DHS Inspector General's office "is investigating allegations that Department of Homeland Security officials improperly attempted to breach the Georgia secretary of state's internal elections network last year." DHS IG spokeswoman Erica Paulson "confirmed the office has launched an investigation."

DOJ FIGHTS ORDER TO PRESERVE EX-DHS OFFICIALS' EMAILS. Politico (1/26, Gerstein, 2.46M) reports in its "Under The Radar" blog that the Justice Department is asking a federal judge "to reconsider an order requiring four former Department of Homeland Security officials, including ex-Secretary Jeh Johnson, to preserve many of their emails stored on private accounts." Politico notes that last week, US District Court Judge Randolph Moss "ordered that Johnson and three former top DHS officials move messages they stored in online, personal accounts to thumb drives or hard drives for safekeeping." Judge Moss "said he ordered the move out of 'an abundance of caution' in connection with a Judicial Watch Freedom of Information Act lawsuit exploring the officials' use of personal email on government computers." Justice Department attorneys "opposed the preservation order, saying the officials already pledged to hang on to any potentially responsive emails in their accounts," and on Thursday, "federal government attorneys went back to Moss, asking him to reconsider the order."

COLOMBIAN DRUG TRAFFICKING SUSPECT CLAIMS TO BE ICE, DEA INFORMANT. The Miami Herald (1/26, Weaver, 856K) reports Henry De Jesus Lopez Londoño, "an elusive cocaine-trafficking suspect" who "was finally extradited to Miami in November," was working "a confidential informant – or 'deep cover mole' – for two federal agencies, his lawyers say in court documents unsealed Thursday." Lopez Londoño's attorneys claim the defendant "put his life on the line to help the war on drugs – including infiltrating a dangerous drug-trafficking cartel headed by Mexican kingpin Joaquin 'El Chapo' Guzman, as well as paramilitary groups and members of the al-Qaida terrorist network in Colombia" – and "was promised 'favorable treatment' by agents" from ICE and DEA. The Herald adds that the US Attorney's office in Miami has "confirmed that Lopez Londoño was once" an ICE source, "but prosecutors said the DEA 'never' formally used him as an informant."

ICE AGENT ALLEGEDLY RAIDED LAS VEGAS KOREAN RESTAURANT IN EXCHANGE FOR FREE FOOD. The Washington Post (1/26, Schmidt, 11.43M) reports a lawsuit filed by owners of Club Yamang, a popular Las Vegas Korean club, alleges ICE special agent Joohoon David Lee "had been harassing the restaurant owners and employees in exchange for copious amounts of free food and drinks at a rival Las Vegas supper club, Club Sonagi, also popular for its Korean food, music and attractive hostesses." The suit claims "Lee and the owner of Club Sonagi 'hatched a plan to drive Club Yamang out of business and into financial ruin,'" in return for which Lee would be "comped" for all food and drinks at Club Sonagi. Lee was indicted in 2015 "in an unrelated bribery case in Los Angeles, pleading guilty months later," which

Club Yamang owners' attorney Paul Padda said "corroborated what we had sensed regarding Lee's ulterior motives." According to the Post, the suit – "filed this month on behalf of three investors and co-owners and the now-wife of the former owner" – follows a similar suit "filed in April on behalf of the restaurant's former owner, Thomas Kim."

ICE AGENTS MISTAKENLY VISIT COMMUNITY CENTER IN SAN FRANCISCO. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/26, Barros, 2.2M) reports ICE agents "attempted to arrest two people suspected of being undocumented immigrants in the Mission District on Thursday morning, but left with no arrests made." Good Samaritan Resource Center executive director Mario Paz is quoted saying, "ICE agents arrived to our center at about 9:20 a.m. this morning. ... An agent entered our center with two papers in hand and asked if two individuals lived here ... Our staff responded that this is not a residency, that this is a community center." Paz "said it was no coincidence that the visit occurred the day after President Donald Trump threatened to cut federal funding for sanctuary cities like San Francisco."

The San Francisco Examiner (1/26, Rodriguez, 425K) reports ICE agents "seeking an undocumented immigrant visited a home in San Francisco's Mission District on Thursday, but not before first stopping at a building housing a preschool next door by mistake, an agency spokesperson confirmed." The Examiner says the Good Samaritan Family Resource Center "contains a preschool on site, where 30 toddlers and children played feet away from where ICE agents entered the center." ICE spokesperson Virginia Kice "said the agents first went to the person's last known address and identified themselves as ICE officers, but were told the correct address was actually next door." Kice is quoted saying, "ICE's enforcement actions are targeted and lead driven, focusing on individuals who pose a threat to national security, border security, and public safety."

SFist (1/26, Barmann, 116K) says, "The immigration crackdown has begun, and some ICE agents, possibly emboldened or directed by the new Trump regime, conducted a rare raid in San Francisco Thursday, descending upon the Good Samaritan Family Resource Center in the Mission."

The Los Angeles (CA) Times (1/26, Hamilton, 4.52M) also reports, adding that ICE "said it was not a raid but a targeted effort to find a convicted sex offender wanted for deportation."

TEXAS WOMAN PLEADS GUILTY TO CHILD PORN CHARGES. The Houston Chronicle (1/26, Banks, 1.91M) reports Tracey Lynn Bautista of League City, Texas "pleaded guilty in Galveston Thursday to receiving child pornography via texts and online messaging." Bautista "was tracked by" HSI "and the Montgomery County Precinct 1 Constable's Office after she exchanged messages with a person who had been arrested for promoting of child pornography."

Customs and Border Protection:

MORGAN RESIGNS AS BORDER PATROL CHIEF. The Washington Post (1/26, Markon, Rein, Lowery, 11.43M) reports that US Border Patrol Chief Mark Morgan "has resigned after only six months on the job." The Post says "officials familiar with the decision said that Morgan...was removed by Kevin K. McAleenan, acting commissioner of the U.S. Customs and Border Protection agency" – noting that Morgan had previously "clashed with the powerful Border Patrol union, which endorsed Trump for president and whose leaders were present at Trump's announcement of his immigration crackdown at Department of Homeland Security headquarters Friday." The Washington Times (1/26, Dinan, 272K) similarly reports that Morgan "has tangled with the National Border Patrol Council, the labor union that represents line agents."

According to Reuters (1/26, Ainsley), McAleenan said in a statement, "On behalf of the men and women of U.S. Customs and Border Protection and the U.S. Border Patrol, I want to thank Mark Morgan for his unwavering dedication to our border security mission, and recognize his life-long career in service to the nation."

The AP (1/26, Spagat, Caldwell) cites a "US official who was on brief video conference in which Morgan informed senior agents of the change," who said that Morgan "said he was asked to leave and decided to resign rather than fight the request." The AP adds that Morgan's "forced resignation" leaves President Trump "with a leadership gap but also gives him a chance to start fresh with a Border Patrol chief of his own choosing."

According to the New York (NY) Times (1/26, Nixon, Subscription Publication, 13.9M), Morgan's last day at the agency will be Tuesday. The anonymous DHS official said "Morgan had expressed a desire to stay at the agency in the Trump administration," sending "an internal email to Border Patrol staff members after the election criticizing the immigration enforcement policies of President Barack Obama and his Homeland Security secretary, Jeh C. Johnson." Although CBP didn't say who will replace Morgan, the Times mentions former Maricopa County, Arizona sheriff Joseph Arpaio, "who clashed with the Obama administration over his illegal immigration raids, was mentioned as a possible replacement' during the presidential campaigns."

EJ Montini of the Arizona Republic (1/26, Montini, 1.1M) considers whether Arpaio is a feasible choice to replace Morgan. Montini argues that, before Trump's election "it would have been considered inappropriate and best and political suicide at worst to appoint someone to such a position while that person is facing a criminal trial." However, "we don't live in that world anymore" – so "the thing that we would be if Trump tapped Arpaio to head the border patrol is … surprised."

BORDER PATROL UNION HEAD: US WILL BE SAFER WITH TRUMP'S WALL. NPR (1/26, 1.92M) carries a transcript and audio clip of an interview with head of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents Border Patrol agents, Brandon Judd. Judd discussed how border security is going to change if Trump's orders are carried out. He clarified that "we're talking about a wall in strategic locations which then helps the Border Patrol agents do their job better," rather than "a continuous wall from California down to Texas." Judd added that he expects "the country is going to be a lot safer" once the immigration measures are in place.

Fox Business (1/26, Wisner, 269K) reports Judd also appeared on the FOX Business Network Thursday to explain "why he feels 5,000 agents is enough to secure the border." He said, "It is enough. In fact, if we were able to put all the agents that we currently have on the border, we would be able to secure the border given that we get the additional technology such as the wall." However, he said many agents are assigned to duties other than protecting the border. Judd said, "If the agency determines that those individuals are needed in the places that they're at, then we do need that additional 5,000 agents in order to secure the border."

CBP AGENT'S RADIO BLOCKED KNIFE IN STRUGGLE WITH UNDOCUMENTED IMMIGRANT. The Arizona Daily Star (1/26, Duarte, 270K) reports a Border Patrol agent was nearly stabbed by an undocumented immigrant, who "instead struck a handheld radio," during the altercation "shortly after 9 p.m. Tuesday near Three Points, according to a U.S. Customs and Border Protection news release." The Daily Star adds that the agent got "help from another agent who was in an Air and Marine Operations helicopter that landed in a clearing," after which the suspect was arrested.

Border Patrol Agent Stabbed. KVOA-TV Tucson, AZ (1/26, Palanuk, 23K) reports that a migrant attempted to stab a Border Patrol agent on Tuesday night, according to CBP. The individual "was part of a group of migrants walking through the desert near Three Points" and tried to flee, which resulted in a struggle. The agent's "hand-held radio attached to his body armor blocked the knife."

The article notes that Antuzzi attorney Stephen Sebald "said Thursday afternoon that Antuzzi is currently in an inpatient treatment setting, in a special program to help people suffering

GORKA FACES CRIMINAL CHARGE FOR TRYING TO BOARD FLIGHT WITH A GUN. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Harris, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that national security and terrorism analyst Sebastian Gorka, who has been selected by President Trump for a senior White House position, is facing a criminal charge for allegedly trying to bring a handgun onto a flight at Ronald Reagan National Airport last January. A TSA statement says Gorka was stopped in the airport after a TSA officer detected a 9mm caliber handgun using X-ray equipment. Gorka was cited on a state weapons charge, and the gun was confiscated.

The new airlines include "Aruba Airlines, Avianca, Boutique Airlines, Emirates, Key Lime Air, Miami Air International, Southern Airways Express, Spirit Airlines, Sunwing, Virgin Atlantic and Xtra Airways." According to the Hill, the PreCheck program "allows passengers who have undergone background checks to move through expedited security lanes without taking off their shoes or removing electronics from their bags."

GOVERNOR: FEDERAL AID APPROVAL COVERS SIX STORM-DAMAGED COUNTIES IN GEORGIA. The AP (1/26) reports Georgia Gov. Nathan Deal said on Thursday that President Trump has approved federal aid for six storm-damaged counties in his state. The damage occurred last weekend, according to the AP, which points out that Trump also recently approved federal aid "for prior storms that damaged southwest Georgia on Jan. 2." Focusing solely on the more recent aid approval, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Bluestein, 1.41M) reports a FEMA statement "said the assistance could include grants for temporary housing and home repairs, low-cost loans to cover uninsured property losses and other programs to help victims recover."

An online WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/26, 415K) report, which also focuses its coverage on the more recent aid approval, notes that Deal said he is "tremendously grateful for the immediate assistance and attention President Trump has given Georgia's requests for federal aid, as well as his concern for our citizens." Deal added, "I'd also like to thank President Trump for sending the acting director of FEMA to view firsthand the horrific effects of this natural disaster. FEMA, along with the Georgia Emergency Management and Homeland Security Agency, is working to expedite financial assessments in the remaining counties impacted by the storms." The Albany (GA) Herald (1/26, Hendricks, 2K) and the WFXL-TV Albany, GA (1/26, 1K) website also highlights Deal's remarks.

WALB-TV Albany, GA (1/26, Hoskins, 42K), meanwhile, reports on its website that Turner is one of the Georgia counties covered by Trump's most recent aid approval. The story adds, "FEMA officials were on the ground" in Georgia on Thursday, "talking with folks who have lost everything."

US Citizenship and Immigration Services:

PRESIDENT OBAMA CHANGED USCIS POLICY TO ENSURE TRANSGENDER IMMIGRANTS GET DOCUMENTS. Mic (1/26, Rodriguez, 554K) reports that among the actions taken by President Obama in the last few days of his tenure in preparation for the Trump Administration was to provide assistance to "ensure transgender immigrants are able to get their legal documents in order." According to Mic, USCIS received a memo requiring that it "change the gender marker on an official document if the person applying for the document presents" either a court order, an amended government document or a letter from a licensed professional confirming the gender identity of the applicant.

Immigration:

TRUMP'S PLAN TO END "CATCH AND RELEASE" OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS MAY BE HAMPERED BY LACK OF SPACE. Reuters (1/26, Daniel) reports immigrant advocates warn President Trump's plan to end the "catch and release" policy – under which "illegal immigrants are caught and then freed pending hearings" – may "hit a will...and not the one he is planning to build on the Mexican border." Annunciation House director Ruben Garcia, whose charity "gives shelter to migrant families," warned that ICE is "releasing them not because they want to do catch and release, but because detention centers don't have enough space." Reuters points out that "almost half the immigrants apprehended by U.S. officials are now Central American families or children" but "only a tiny number of detention spaces are available for those categories of immigrants." While "Trump did announce plans to increase the number of family detention centers," Reuters says "establishing them will take time and could face legal challenges, legal experts on immigration said."

"CIVIL RIGHTS ADVOCATES" OBJECT TO IMMIGRATION ORDERS. The Washington Post (1/26, Zapotosky, 11.43M) reports President Trump on Wednesday signed an order directing the homeland security secretary "to deputize local law enforcement officials to enforce immigration laws," which "civil rights advocates" say could lead police "to racially profile those they encounter." Cecillia Wang, deputy legal director at the American Civil Liberties Union, said the orders are "a shot across the bow of immigrant communities and those localities or states that are welcoming of immigrant communities." In addition, Trump is bringing back the Secure Communities program, characterized as "controversial."

Maria Cardona, a principal at the Dewey Square Group, a Democratic strategist, and a CNN/CNN Español political commentator, writes at The Hill (1/26, Cardona, Contributor, 1.25M) "Pundits Blog" blog that Trump's orders are "part of his continued attack on the immigrant, Latino, and Muslim communities." She also criticizes the "crack down on so-called sanctuary cities," arguing that "no legal term of the kind actually exists." Finally, she argues that "the solution" is "comprehensive immigration reform." She says Trump's policies would "end our America as we know it."

REACTIONS OF "SANCTUARY CITIES" TO TRUMP'S EXECUTIVE ORDERS DISCUSSED. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/26, Ting, 2.2M) continues coverage of the response by mayors and cities across the country to President Trump's executive order that would cut federal funding to "sanctuary cities." The Chronicle notes some mayors have indicated their willingness "to sacrifice federal funding to keep their sanctuary status" and provides a list of mayoral statements to that effect in cities from California to New Jersey.

In California, the Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chang, Esquivel, Lau, 4.52M) says Trump's order is setting the stage "for a pitched battle with [state] officials who have long prioritized building ties with immigrant communities."

San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee in his annual state of the city speech on Thursday "reiterated the city's 'sanctuary' status," the AP (1/26) reports. The article also says Lee previously noted that Trump's threat to withhold any part of the $1 billion a year the city receives "lacked specifics so officials are unclear on what might be at stake for the city's budget."

New California Attorney General Xavier Becerra also expressed his determination to defend immigrants in the state in an interview conducted with NPR (1/26, 1.92M). He said, “We’re going to do everything we can to protect the citizens and residents of the state of California.” When asked what California cities can refuse to do, Becerra also noted holding people without basis violates the Fourth Amendment.

New York Mayor Bill de Blasio in a Thursday CNN appearance emphasized how Trump’s order “threatened to upend years of progress police departments have made cultivating trust in immigrant neighborhoods,” the New York Daily News (1/26, Durkin, 4.45M) reports. He said, “This is the kind of thing that will destroy that promise, and make it impossible for the police to keep cities safe.”

De Blasio moreover threatened to sue the Trump Administration, saying at a City Hall press conference, “President Trump issued an executive order today and it’s purported purpose was to enhance public safety, but here in New York City and in cities across this nation this executive order could in fact undermine public safety,” The Hill (1/26, Savransky, 1.25M) adds. He noted the effect of such funding cuts would “first and foremost fall on the NYPD.”

Meanwhile, New York Assembly member Nicole Malliotakis indicated that NYPD statistics highlight how the city cooperated with only two of 80 ICE detainer requests, the New York Post (1/26, 3.82M) says. The Post quotes Malliotakis as saying, “It’s truly frightening that our city refuses to treat criminals in accordance with federal law, and would jeopardize federal funding by harboring individuals who have committed crimes from deportation.”

In Long Island, members of various immigrant, women’s and minority groups and communities joined congregants on Thursday at the Bay Shore mosque “to condemn immigration enforcement orders from President Donald Trump that they said will harm the most vulnerable,” Newsday (NY) (1/26, Ramos, 1.3M) reports. The article notes almost 40 individuals gathered at the mosque and said Trump’s order would be “countered by their campaign for unity, with Latinos, Muslims, Jewish, LGBTQ and women’s reproductive rights advocates joining so far what they’re calling the Long Island Unity Collaborative.”

In Chicago, immigration activists demanded Mayor Rahm Emanuel “strengthen Chicago’s Welcoming City Ordinance by removing all of the exceptions,” the Chicago Sun-Times (1/26, Spielman, 798K) says. Currently Chicago Police are “permitted to cooperate with Immigration and Customs Enforcement if targeted individuals are: in the city’s gang database; have pending felony prosecutions or prior felony convictions or if they are the subject of an outstanding criminal warrant.” Activists are demanding this be eliminated.

Joining colleagues in California, New York, Chicago, and other states and cities across the country in responding to Trump’s executive orders, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Salzer, 1.41M) cites Atlanta Mayor Kasim Reed as condemning the orders and “saying Atlanta is a welcoming community that ‘has stood up for the civil and human rights of every person, and we will not waver now.’”

Similarly, the Mayors of Minneapolis and St. Paul also “offered a defiant response to President Donald Trump’s executive order,” the Rochester (MN) Post-Bulletin (1/26, NELSON, 25K) reports. Accordingly, Minneapolis has asserted that it will not rescind its policy “that blocks police from reporting immigration violations, Mayor Betsy Hodges said Wednesday.” St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman also said he does not believe Trump’s order on blocking federal funds to sanctuary cities would apply to the $13 million the city gets every year.

Madison, Wisconsin Mayor Paul Soglin has additionally held firm to remaining a “sanctuary city” despite the potential loss of federal money, while Police Chief Mike Koval has also said his officers will “never inquire about immigration status,” the AP (1/26) reports. Soglin said that while the city will comply with ICE detainer requests, the city itself will not detain immigrants and the police will not “enforce federal immigration laws.”

Colleges and universities nationwide are also “preparing to defend their students from potential immigration raids under President Trump,” though USA Today (1/26, Gomez, 5.28M) says “it’s unclear how much power they actually have to shield their students.” The article notes that many of these schools have assured their undocumented student population in various ways they will not cooperate with ICE agents.

University of California system president Janet Napolitano has also moved to determine what they can do "to shelter its students if he carried through on his pledges to cancel the program, Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals," the New York Times (1/26, PRESTON, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports. However, the Times also indicates Napolitano "does not mention the word 'sanctuary' when describing what the university could offer," but has instead "published detailed principles of support for undocumented students."

U.S. News & World Report (1/26, Camera, 1.02M) adds school districts across the country are also "pledging to defend illegal students," including Los Angeles Unified, Pittsburgh Public Schools, and Clark County School Board.

The Washington Examiner (1/26, Bedard, 400K), however, criticizes the fact that Democratic mayors did not speak out when President Obama targeted "sanctuary cities." It says that these mayors who are now "assailing President Trump's threat to cut off funding so-called sanctuary cities" did not do so when Obama attempted the same a year ago.

MIAMI-DADE FIRST TO BACK DOWN AND COMPLY WITH TRUMP'S "SANCTUARY" CRACKDOWN. The Miami Herald (1/26, Mazzei, 856K) reports Miami-Dade Mayor Carlos Gimenez ordered county jails to comply with ICE detention requests on Thursday, fearing the loss in millions of federal dollars for "defying immigration authorities." In a memo to interim director of the corrections and rehabilitation department Daniel Junior, Gimenez wrote, "In light of the provisions of the Executive Order, I direct you and your staff to honor all immigration detainer requests received from the Department of Homeland Security."

President Trump on Thursday also "hail[ed]" Gimenez's decision as "the first victory in his fight against 'sanctuary cities,'" USA Today (1/26, Gomez, 5.28M) reports. The article says Trump "praised" Gimenez for making a decision that would ensure the country does not lose any of the $355 million in federal funds slated for 2017.

The Hill (1/26, Vladimirov, 1.25M) adds that Miami-Dade never officially called itself a "sanctuary" city and that it has requested a federal review of its status in 2016.

However, Politico (1/26, Lima, Caputo, 2.46M) says Gimenez indicated to ICE that in order for the country to honor detainer requests, it would "need to start cooperating with the county and paying for the detention of illegal immigrants in one of the nation's largest counties of foreign-born residents." Gimenez said, "If ICE asks us to detain someone we arrested – not for immigration issues because we're not immigration officers – we feel ICE should pay the bill and bear the responsibility for housing their inmate."

STATE RESPONSES TO TRUMP'S SANCTUARY CITIES ORDER MIXED. The Syracuse (NY) Post-Standard (1/26, Weiner, 531K) reports Onondaga County, New York Sheriff Gene Conway on Wednesday "said...he has never received a request from federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials to detain an undocumented immigrant during his two years in office." He said that if he were to receive such a request, he likely would comply. Conway said, "It has always been my purpose to cooperate with law enforcement, whether it is local, state or federal."

The AP (1/26, Richman) reports two Howard County, MD Council members, Calvin Ball and Jen Terrasa, are moving forward with new legislation that would "declare their county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants, even after President Donald Trump announced his intention to crack down on such jurisdictions." Ball is quoted as saying, "We're at a crossroads. We have to decide what kind of community we're going to be."

Meanwhile, school board trustees in Las Vegas, Nevada "are being asked to declare an immigration safe haven for students regardless of their citizenship status," Fox News (1/26, 11.07M) reports. Clark County School District board member Carolyn Edwards proposed a resolution Thursday "to reinforce protections for children of immigrants under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals order."

LOCAL OFFICIALS OBJECT TO SANCTUARY CITIES ORDER. The AP (1/26) reports Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder (R) said that though one of President Trump's orders "instructs the Homeland Security secretary to engage with governors and local officials" about immigration enforcement, it is not "one of the 'primary' functions for state and local police." Snyder also said that he will "continue to promote Michigan as a welcoming place for immigrants."

The AP (1/26) reports that Iowa City officials said that though the city has a policy of not enforcing federal immigration laws, "they don't think the city will lose" federal funds. The city council did not adopt a "sanctuary city" label, but did say it does not use local resources for immigration enforcement.

The Norwich (CT) Bulletin (1/26, Kefalas, 63K) reports that Windham, and "all of Connecticut" may "be in the crosshairs of Trump's new immigration policy." That's because the Windham Town Council voted January 17 to become a Sanctuary City, and Connecticut law instructs state and local law enforcement that they may ignore federal detainers for those who have not "committed a serious felony." Under the order the Department of Homeland Security would list jurisdictions that declined to honor detainers.

The Hill (1/26, Wilson, 1.25M) reports the "sanctuary cities" order "drew swift condemnation from Democratic-led states with significant immigrant populations." Several argued that the orders were in violation of US law or the constitution and would be challenged.

COVERAGE FAULTS SANCTUARY ORDERS. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Jonsson, 387K) reports that in response to the order described as an order to local police "to start looking for undocumented immigrants and reporting them to federal immigration authorities for deportation," Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department spokesman Capt. Jeff Scroggin said, "No." He said that it "is just not what we do." The Monitor says that local police argue that enforcing immigration law reduces trust in police and leads to "more opportunity for criminal activity, not less." According to the Monitor, "most US police departments agree."

The New York Times (1/26, Pérez-Peña, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that while Trump says that "undocumented immigrants pose a threat to public safety," academic studies have found that "immigrants are less likely to commit crimes than people born in the United States." Still, "immigrants are a large slice of the population, and are no doubt to blame for a large share of the crime." According to the Department of Homeland Security, there are 1.9 million noncitizens in the US who have been "convicted of criminal offenses and could be deported."

NBC News (1/26, Conde, 2.67M) reports on the New Sanctuary Movement Coalition in New York City that provides training and legal advice to immigrants. They "role play immigration arrest scenarios to learn what their rights are and how to express them."

The New York Post (1/26, 3.82M) reports that under one of the orders, President Trump would "publish a weekly list of crimes committed by illegal immigrants in the Big Apple and all other sanctuary cities."

The New Yorker (1/26, Wickenden, 3.47M) describes the order as bringing "a federal assault on the hundreds of American cities that have declined to act as immigration police." The article describes illegal immigration as "an enormous, unwieldy problem, far more easily demagogued than solved." It says that Trump could reverse the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals and that some of his supporters keep calling for that, but Trump has suggested "he viewed the Dreamers benignly."

LAW ENFORCEMENT GROUPS "SHARPLY DIVIDED" OVER SANCTUARY CRACKDOWN. USA Today (1/26, Johnson, 5.28M) reports that national law enforcement groups are "sharply divided" over Trump's plan to "crack down" on sanctuary cities, with some warning that "law enforcement's already fraught relationship with minority communities could be further damaged by pressing local officers to enforce immigration laws."

Plans Could Boost Private Prisons. The Arizona Republic (1/26, Roberts, 1.1M) reports that Trump's

“crackdown” on illegal immigration is “stupendous news for the private prison industry.”

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TRUMP ORDER TO WITHHOLD FUNDING TO “SANCTUARY CITIES” DISCUSSED. The Washington Post (1/26, Somin, 11.43M) reports President Trump’s executive order to deny “sanctuary cities” federal funding “has serious constitutional problems” and “is both unconstitutional and a very dangerous precedent.” The Post says that the order could “seriously undermine constitutional federalism by forcing dissenting cities and states to obey presidential dictates, even without authorization from Congress,” and that it threatens the separation of powers.

Lawmakers nationwide also called the order “unconstitutional” and “vow[ed] to protect their diverse communities,” the Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Hoover, 387K) similarly reports. The Monitor cites legal experts who say that by threatening to withhold unspecified amounts of federal funding, Trump might be overstepping his presidential authority.

University of Denver Sturm College of Law associate professor Christopher Lasch writes in The Hill (1/26, Lasch, 1.25M) “Congress Blog” that the order “promises an era of unprecedented cruelty and, like President Trump’s other plans on immigration, is dissociated from factual and legal reality.” Lasch says Trump’s campaign rendered “sanctuary” a “dirty word” and that he justified increased enforcement and attacks on sanctuary jurisdictions by invoking the threat to “public safety.”

However, a new study published by the Center for American Progress and the National Immigration Law Center shows that “sanctuary cities show lower crime and higher economic well-being,” Atlantic’s CityLab (1/26, 175K) says. University of California, San Diego associate professor of political science Tom Wong found in an analysis of ICE data that there have been “35.5 fewer violent and property crimes per 10,000 people in sanctuary counties versus non-sanctuary ones.”

TEXAS SHERIFF RESPONDS TO ABBOTT’S CRITICISM ABOUT “SANCTUARY” STATUS. The AP (1/26) reports Travis County Sheriff Sally Hernandez on Thursday fired back at criticism leveled at her by Gov. Greg Abbott, saying that “streets are safer when people can report crimes ‘without fear of deportation.’”

Abbott, for his part, is seeking more funding lines to cut from Travis County following Hernandez’s refusal to reverse a policy that he says effectively makes Austin a “sanctuary city,” the Dallas Morning News (1/26, Grissom, 1.12M) reports. According to the Morning news, Abbott’s budget director Steven Albright on Thursday “sent a letter to the heads of all state agencies asking them to identify all funds, including federal dollars, that had been allotted to Travis County in the 2016 fiscal year.”

TRUMP’S SANCTUARY CITIES ORDER HAS EXEMPTION FOR POLICE. Reuters (1/26, Rosenberg, Levine, Sullivan) reports President Trump’s executive order to withhold federal funding from “sanctuary cities” has an exemption for police, who the article says “would be protected from cuts.” Reuters says Trump’s opponents, however, have argued such an exemption “makes it much more likely that a judge could strike down that section of the order as unconstitutional.” The article notes this is just one argument that cities and immigration groups are preparing in their fight against the order.

MISSOURI LAWMAKER PROPOSES HARSHER SENTENCES FOR ILLEGAL RE-ENTRANTS. The AP (1/26, Ballentine) reports state Senator Mike Cunningham (R) is leading Missouri lawmakers in another attempt “to pass a bill aimed at cracking down on deported immigrants who come back and commit crimes.” The proposal would establish an “illegal re-entry” sentence of up to 10 years in prison for assaults or felony offenses. According to the AP, the proposal failed “in the House after passing the Senate when it was introduced last year,” but President “Trump’s election could add momentum to such efforts in Missouri and elsewhere.” Missouri Immigrant and Refugee Advocates Executive Director Aimee Abizera argued that Trump’s election “makes it easier for things like this to pass because already the hatred has been brought to the surface. ... People feel like they have a right to do it.” But the AP points out that “pushback” against Trump’s policies has already started in “blue states” – including New York, where a state legislator is pushing to “block the state from signing contracts or investing in companies hired to build a border wall.”

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

TOWNS FAIL IN EFFORTS TO BLOCK UNDOCUMENTED RESIDENTS. The Washington Post (1/26, Harlan, 11.43M) reports on six towns that "began passing laws to block undocumented immigrants from living within their borders." Those efforts were "foiled by court rulings, settlements or challenges with enforcement." In several cases, the towns also were "ordered to pay the legal fees for the civil rights groups that brought suits." The Post says that President Trump's policies too "could face legal challenges." According to the Post, Federal judges "ruled the ordinances discriminatory and unconstitutional" or the towns "backed away" under legal challenges.

REPS. CHAFFETZ, MEADOWS WARN DC MAYOR AGAINST PLANS TO USE FUNDS TO DEFEND ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS. The Washington Post (1/26, Davis, 11.43M) reports Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-ID), chairman of the House Oversight Committee, and Rep. Mark Meadows (R-NC), head of the subcommittee for District affairs, have written to Washington, DC Mayor Muriel E. Bowser, warning her that her "plan to use taxpayer money to defend illegal immigrants from deportation" would "violate federal law." Bowser's policy is to create a $500,000 fund to defend the district's "estimated 25,000 illegal immigrants."

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA DEVELOPS PLAN FOR POSSIBLE CANCELING OF DACA PLAN. The New York Times (1/26, Preston, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports Janet Napolitano, president of the University of California and former secretary of Homeland Security, has "moved quickly to determine what the California system could do to shelter its students" if President Trump cancels the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals. As a result, "the university has published detailed principles of support for undocumented students" and also is "organizing legal help for students detained for deportation." University administrators at other schools "have flatly rejected sanctuary plans."

NEARLY 1,000 NEW YORKERS PROTEST TRUMP IMMIGRATION ORDERS. The New York Times (1/26, Robbins, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that "nearly 1,000" people participated Wednesday in a protest in New York's Washington Square Park against President Trump's executive orders regarding immigration and sanctuary cities. The protest was organized by the Council on American-Islamic Relations. In addition, Assemblyman Francisco P. Moya, (D-Queens) has proposed a measure to "limit the state's cooperation with the police in assisting immigration officers who did not have a judge's warrant to detain immigrants accused of a crime."

OPINION: DREAMERS ARE ONE IMMIGRANT GROUP TRUMP SEEMS WARY OF TARGETING. Vox (1/26, Lind, 1.15M) reports Trump, in spite of making many "immigrants living in the United States priorities for deportation," also "he took pains to reassure one group of unauthorized immigrants: unauthorized immigrants who've been protected from deportation by the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program created by President Obama." Trump told ABC News's David Muir on Wednesday, "We're going to take care of everybody. ... Where you have great people who are here [and] who have done a good job – they shouldn't be worried." However, Vox says even though "the executive order doesn't put DACA recipients at risk yet," the Administration "is known to be considering an end to the program." Vox claims to have "received what appears to be a draft of an executive order that would halt the issuing of new DACA grants and the renewing of existing ones, forcing current DACA recipients to lose their protections one by one over the next two years. Trump is ultimately the person who will determine if DACA recipients have reason to worry or not."

ACTIVISTS ARGUE IMMIGRANTS DESERVE PUBLIC DEFENSE IN DEPORTATION PROCEEDINGS. Jojo Annobil, executive director of the Immigrant Justice Corps, writes in the New York Daily News (1/26, Annobil, 4.45M), on the "urgent need for free and affordable competent counsel in deportation proceedings" saying that the US "continues to aggressively deport tens of thousands of vulnerable, unaccompanied minor children and mothers with children fleeing extreme violence who do not have the benefit of a lawyer." He says that the US recognizes "no right to appointed counsel in deportation proceedings." He argues that competent legal representation would speed the cases and lead to better results. He recommends public funding of immigration attorneys for those in deportation proceedings.

Heidi Altman, director of policy for the National Immigrant Justice Center, writes in the Washington Post (1/26, Altman, 11.43M), that DC Mayor Muriel E. Bowser's (D) plan for "a legal defense fund for immigrants facing deportation" would help to "protect due-process rights for all." She faults Bowser for exempting immigrants who have a “criminal record” from receiving representation, asking, “Since when do we allow a person’s rap sheet to determine whether she or he has the right to a zealous defense in court?”

TRUMP EXPANDS DEFINITION OF CRIMINAL AS IT RELATES TO DEPORTATIONS. The New York Times (1/26, Medina, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports that President Trump’s executive order on building a border wall includes language that provides “an expansive definition of who is considered a criminal – a category of people Mr. Trump has said he would target for deportation.” The Times says a “criminal” under the definition is someone charged with a crime, even if not committed; who has committed acts “that constitute a chargeable criminal offense,” engaged in “fraud or willful misrepresentation in connection with any official matter or application before a governmental agency,” or “anyone who “in the judgment of an immigration officer” poses a risk to either public safety or national security.”

SYRIAN REFUGEES BEING SETTLED IN VERMONT. The CBS Evening News (1/26, story 3, 2:20, Muir, 11.17M) spoke with refugees from Syria, saying that President Trump “is expected to block refugees from Syria.” CBS (Axelrod) traveled to Rutland, Vermont, where 110 Syrian refugees are to be settled, in “a process now in jeopardy.” Marsha Cassel, of Rutland Welcomes, is shown saying, “These are not the people that you need to fear. These people are running for their lives.” Retired teacher Don Cioffi is also shown saying, “It only takes one with a vest on to blow up some of my friends. It only takes one.” CBS concludes its coverage with the story of Rutland realtor Mike Khalil, who emigrated from Syria 35 years ago, is now a US citizen, and said, “If you give them the chance, the same chance that I got, they will see that these folks will be working hard.”

Secret Service:

ALABAMA MAN INDICTED ON COUNTERFEITING, FIREARMS CHARGES. The Gadsden (AL) Times (1/26, 60K) reports Hollis Nikia Bullard, 22, of Birmingham was indicted Thursday “on counterfeiting and firearms charges, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney’s Office.” The Times reports “Secret Service agents recovered counterfeit bills totaling more than $15,000 in the course of the investigation.” Bullard faces up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine for the counterfeiting charges, and up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine for “being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm.”

TEXAS HS TEACHER IN HOT WATER FOR “MOCK ASSASSINATION” OF TRUMP. Fox News (1/26, Starnes, 11.07M) reports a teacher at W.H. Adamson High School in Dallas, TX “has been placed on administrative leave” after posting a video to Instagram showing “her ‘shooting’ President Donald Trump inside a classroom while screaming, ‘Die!’” The teacher reportedly posted the video to her Instagram account “with the following message: ‘Watching the #inauguration in my classroom like…#no #stop #denial #squirtgun #hypocrisy #powerless #saveusall #teachthembetter #atleastitsfriday.’” According to Fox, “the Secret Service field office in Irving tells me they are aware of the incident, but declined further comment.”

MISSOURI SENATE COMMITTEE ADVANCES REAL ID COMPLIANCE PROPOSAL. The AP (1/26) reports the Missouri state Senate Veterans and Military Affairs Committee voted 4-3 Thursday to advance a proposal that would bring the state “into compliance with federal driver’s license requirements.” The AP explains that current law “prohibits the state from complying with the federal 2005 Real ID Act, which set tougher proof-of-identity requirements in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks,” but the proposed legislation would “give people a choice of getting licenses that are Real ID compliant or not.”

Cyber News:

PRESIDENT APPEARS TO CONTINUE USING UNSECURED MEANS OF COMMUNICATION. Vanity Fair (1/26, Kosoff, 6.22M) reports that “one week into his tenure as president...Trump appears to still be using private lines of communication," including his "unsecured" Android phone "for tweeting purposes." Vanity Fair notes a blog about the Android operating system "has determined Trump likely uses a Samsung Galaxy S3, which was first released five years ago." Writer Alex Dobie is quoted saying, "It's safe to say it's a good three years out of step with the latest Android security updates." Furthermore, the President's @POTUS account "seems to be connected to a Gmail address, as opposed to a secure, White House email address," and does not appear to have two-factor authentication enabled. Vanity Fair says, "The greatest national-security threat to the United States...may be Trump. ... One imagines it would not be difficult to hack the president, or to mimic his exclamatory, erratic rhetorical style, causing market chaos or, worse, a geopolitical panic."

Politico (1/26, Geller, 2.46M) says, "Reports that President Donald Trump has resumed using his Android-powered smartphone are prompting security experts to warn that his Twitter addiction could open up vulnerabilities inside the Oval Office." Computer science professor Matthew Green is quoted saying, "It's just crazy that the president is interacting with such an out-of-date and likely insecure device." Bruce Schneier, "one of the world's foremost cybersecurity experts," is quoted saying, "His off-the-shelf Android could potentially become a room bug without his knowledge. ... An attacker could certainly hijack his apps."

QUANTUM COMPUTER SOLD TO CYBERSECURITY FIRM. CNBC (1/26, 2.17M) reports, "A state-of-the-art computer system using quantum mechanics and valued at $15 million has been sold to a cyber-security firm." D-Wave, the computer's developer, "announced the sale to Temporal Defense Systems, earlier this week." D-Wave "claims that using the quantum computer will enable the cyber security firm to perform real-time security level rating, device-to-device authentication and identify, detect and prevent threats."

MICROSOFT TO CONTINUE MAKING CYBERSECURITY R&D INVESTMENTS. Reuters (1/26, Cohen) reports Microsoft "will continue to invest over $1 billion annually on cyber security research and development in the coming years, a senior executive said." Microsoft vice president of security Bharat Shah is cited saying the amount does not include acquisitions the company may make in the sector. Reuters adds, "In addition to its internal security investments, Microsoft has bought three security firms, all in Israel, in a little over two years."

AT&T "FIGHTING BACK" AGAINST FCC CLAIMS REGARDING TELECOM CYBERSECURITY. Fierce Telecom (1/26, Buckley, 912) reports, "AT&T is fighting back against claims made by the FCC that the telecom community lacks the capability to protect consumers and business customers from cyberattacks." AT&T, in a blog post, "takes issue over two claims the FCC made in its paper: service providers like AT&T don't have the incentives to protect its network and customers from cyberattacks, and the regulator's authority over cybersecurity." AT&T executive Chris Boyer is quoted writing in the post, "We're well aware of the threats to our network and our customers, and are taking meaningful steps to counter these risks."

PEW SURVEY: MOST AMERICAN ADULTS HAVE BEEN VICTIMS OF MAJOR DATA BREACH. Fast Company (1/26, 2.44M) reports, "A new survey from the Pew Research Center finds that most American adults have been the victims of some kind of 'major data breach,' and that many of us don't trust big organizations to keep our data safe." Fast Company reviews "some of the more alarming numbers from the report," including that "51% of respondents said they're 'not at all confident' or 'not too confident' in social media sites keeping their information safe – and 49% feel that way about the federal government."

MARIN: CYBER PROFESSIONALS MUST COMMUNICATE WITH COMPANY MANAGEMENT EFFECTIVELY REGARDING VULNERABILITIES. NetCentrics Corporation program manager Marvin Marin writes in Government Computer News (1/26, Marin, 1K) that cybersecurity professionals may be frustrated by discussing security issues with company decision makers who accept the risk of a breach in order to keep important systems functioning. Marin says, "The blame can't rest solely on management's shoulders; perhaps cyber professionals should accept part of the blame." Marin adds, "Putting cyber risk in context and communicating it effectively makes cyber professionals the source of real, relevant, reliable threat information." Marin discusses a scenario in which a security professional discusses a potential breach in terms of a "price tag" and provides evidence that hackers are aware of and targeting the vulnerability in question. Marin says that by discussing issues in these terms, “you have proved you understand their needs and have shown how your work can support their decision making by providing realistic, actionable solutions that will keep your organization secure.”

NEW YORK MAN LINKED TO ISIL SENTENCED TO 20 YEARS IN PRISON FOR NEW YEAR’S EVE PLOT. Reuters (1/26, Stempel) reports that an upstate New York man was sentenced on Thursday to 20 years in prison “after pleading guilty to conspiring to provide material support to Islamic State, in connection with his alleged role in preparing a New Year’s Eve attack in 2015 at a local club or bar.” Emanuel Lutchman, 26, of Rochester, New York was sentenced by Chief US District Judge Frank Geraci following his August 11 guilty plea. Reuters adds that the prison term “was the maximum possible, and Lutchman was also sentenced to 50 years of supervised release.” According to his plea agreement, Lutchman “admitted to having bought a machete, knives, ski masks and other items for his attack, in which he was prepared to kidnap or kill people, and planned to later release a video explaining his actions.”

CIA’S DIRECTORATE OF DIGITAL INNOVATION MAKING GOOD PROGRESS, ITS LEADERS SAY. CyberScoop (1/26, Bing) reports that the CIA’s Directorate of Digital Innovation, created by then-Director John Brennan two years ago, is now “delivering capabilities that will enable CIA to transform the business of intelligence,” said Sean Roche, the DDI’s associate deputy director. Roche’s boss, DDI Director Andrew Hallman, said, “The way we help people use digital and cyber techniques, [the DDI] will raise it to a new level.” The progress, says CyberScoop, comes as the Trump Administration and new Director Pompeo evaluate “the role, responsibility and mission of nearly every federal organization.”

CONCERN FOR CONNECTED VEHICLE HACKINGS PROMPTS FEDERAL STUDY. CIO Magazine (1/26, Steiner, 471K) reports that, following the release of a 2016 memo by the FBI, Department of Transportation, and National Highway Traffic Safety Administration regarding hacking risks in connected vehicles, law enforcement officials are now concerned about the use of laptops and other devices to steal vehicles as well as personal data. CIO recommends that owners with connected vehicles regularly update software, while suggesting that manufacturers increase security against malware and third-party takeovers. In the event that updates cannot be automatically installed, owners should visit dealers to verify the security of their vehicles, particularly in the event of a recall. Increased steps towards ensuring security, the magazine proposes, will also ensure customer loyalty and protection.

According to GeekWire (1/26, Stampher, 59K), a bipartisan bill prescribing a Highway Traffic Safety Administration study on cyber security in connected vehicles entered consideration in the House of Representatives Wednesday. In partnership with the Federal Trade Commission, the Defense Department, and others, the study would create a standard for isolating vehicle software systems, storing system data, and preventing data breaches. Some legislators called the process “‘a daunting challenge’” as competitors like Microsoft seek to unseat Tesla from its reign in the market by partnering with vehicle makers on “‘incredibly complicated’” platforms that can “‘handle the data,’” Microsoft executive vice president of business development Peggy Johnson said.

VIRGINIA COMMUNITY COLLEGE GIVEN CYBER DEFENSE AWARD BY NSA, DHS. The Danville (VA) Register & Bee (1/26, Metcalfe, 2K) reports the NSA and DHS officially designated the Danville Community College as a National Center of Academic Excellence in Cyber Defense, Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe announced Thursday at a DCC event. McAuliffe said, “This prestigious designation is not only good news for DCC, it is good news for the commonwealth,” while noting that more than 3,500 cybersecurity jobs in the state remain unfilled.

“DOOMSDAY CLOCK” MOVES CLOSER TO MIDNIGHT THAN AT ANY TIME SINCE 1953. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 10, 0:30, Holt, 16.61M) reported that “scientists” have moved the “Doomsday Clock” forward to “two minutes and 30 seconds before midnight,” which is “the closest it’s been to midnight since the 1950s,” blaming “nationalism worldwide, cyber threats and active and blatant disregarding for factual science” for the change. USA Today (1/26, Bowerman, 5.28M) says the change was made due to “increasing worries over nuclear weapons and climate change.” The clock is the product of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. They set the clock at “the closest it’s been to midnight since 1953,” and “blamed a cocktail of threats ranging from dangerous political rhetoric to the potential of nuclear threat." Rachel Bronson, the executive director and publisher of Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, issued a statement pointing to "fake news" as well as "reckless" use of words by "a President-elect of the United States...to address the twin threats of nuclear weapons and climate change." The New York Times (1/26, Bromwich, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) says "it is getting closer to midnight," but also points out that the "clock" is "not a scientific instrument, or even a physical one." The time is set by a board that has met semiannually since 1973.

U.S. News & World Report (1/26, Soergel, 1.02M), the Washington Post (1/26, 11.43M), the Los Angeles Times (1/26, Hennigan, 4.52M), the Sacramento (CA) Bee (1/26, Holley, 574K), The Hill (1/26, Firozi, 1.25M), and Reuters (1/26, Clarke) also cover this story.

ARRESTED FSB OFFICER ALLEGEDLY SPIED FOR US. USA Today (1/26, Stanglin, 5.28M) reports Sergei Mikhailov, a senior FSB intelligence officer and cybersecurity investigator, was arrested in December on treason charges for allegedly providing information to US intelligence services, according to Russian media outlets. Mikhailov was arrested with Ruslan Stoyanov, a top manager for Russia's largest cybersecurity firm, while "two other people, including Major Dmitry Dokuchaev, also an FSB officer, were arrested in connection with the case, according to Russia's REN-TV." The FSB reportedly thinks Mikhailov told US intelligence about Vladimir Fomenko and his server rental company "King Servers," which was identified by the US cybersecurity firm Threat Connect last year as an "information nexus" used by "hackers suspected of working for Russian intelligence in cyberattacks on electoral systems in Arizona and Illinois."

CYBERSECURITY WORKER SHORTAGE INCREASES BENEFITS FOR EMPLOYEES. TechRepublic (1/26, DeNisco, 66K) reports job postings for cybersecurity positions have gone up 74 percent over the past five years with nearly one million jobs going unfilled worldwide. That number is expected to grow to 1.5 million by 2019. However, in the US, over the past two years, interest in cybersecurity fields has increased 11 percent. As a result of high demand and low supply, applicants can be more selective in choosing a career while also earning significantly more money.

National Security News:

TRUMP SAYS ISIL ARE "SNEAKY, DIRTY RATS." In an interview on Fox News' Hannity (1/26, 535K), President Trump described ISIL as "sneaky, dirty rats. And they blow people up in a shopping center. And they blow people up in a church. These are bad people. When you are fighting Germany, and they had their uniforms and Japan, and they had their uniforms and they had their flags on the plane and the whole thing. We are fighting sneaky rats right now that are sick and demented and we are going to win."

PENTAGON SAYS MATTIS' VIEWS ON BANNED INTERROGATION TECHNIQUES ARE UNCHANGED. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Sonne, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that Pentagon spokesman Navy Capt. Jeff Davis said Thursday that Defense Secretary Mattis' position on banned interrogation techniques like waterboarding has not changed from the views he expressed at his confirmation hearing, which indicates that he is opposed to reinstating them.

Meanwhile, the AP (1/26, Dodds, Hinnant) says that after media reports said a draft executive order shows that President Trump is seeking input on "whether torture works, if secret CIA black sites should be used again to interrogate suspects and whether the US prison camp at Guantanamo Bay" should remain open and accept future detainees, White House press secretary Sean Spicer "said the draft order was not a 'White House-originated' document," and House Speaker Ryan said, "This is not something the Trump administration is planning on, working on." However, "rights advocates say even the smallest move backward could bring legal troubles, especially with regard to CIA black sites that were used for interrogation." The AP adds that there are concerns that "if Trump embraces past policies, there could be a backlash from extremist groups, increasing the threat of terrorism against the United States."

Human Rights Groups Condemn Trump's Comments On Torture. Reuters (1/26, Nebehay) says that the International Committee of the Red Cross and the International Commission of Jurists have joined other human rights groups including Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and Reprieve in condemning President Trump “for condoning torture.” The rebukes come in the wake of Trump’s comments in an ABC News interview that he believes “waterboarding ‘worked’ as an intelligence-gathering tool.”

John Hohmann wrote on the Washington Post (1/26, 11.43M) “The Daily 202” blog that Trump’s comments on torture during the interview have “some liberal internationalists find themselves privately pining for George W. Bush” as Bush “understood that copping to the enhanced interrogation techniques he had secretly approved could undercut our moral standing on the world stage, provide terrorists a potent recruiting tool and give our enemies an excuse to torture Americans.”

WSJOURNAL ANALYSIS: DECLARING MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD TERRORISTS COULD HAVE UNEXPECTED CONSEQUENCES. In an analysis piece, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, Trofimov, Subscription Publication, 6.37M) reports that the Trump Administration’s plans to declare the Muslim Brotherhood a terrorist organization could have unexpected consequences in the Middle East. With Brotherhood affiliates in several countries legislatures, the move could give the perception that the US is confirming terrorist assertions that the country will not accept the outcome of democratic processes that run counter to US wishes. Additionally, critical allies in the region support the Brotherhood, including Turkey’s President Recep Tayyip Erdogan. A member of a Brotherhood spinoff is Prime Minister of Morocco, a Brotherhood offshoot is part of Tunisia’s government coalition, and Brotherhood affiliates have members in the legislatures of Jordan, Iraq, and Kuwait.

GUANTANAMO HAS CELL SPACE FOR 200 NEW CAPTIVES. The Miami Herald (1/26, Rosenberg, 856K) reports that while the US detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba has not received any new orders from the White House of the Pentagon, spokesman Navy Capt. John Filostrat said the facility “has functional cell space for perhaps 200 new captives,” and “commanders are studying how to add new captives should the new president make good on his pledge to ‘load it up with some bad dudes.’” Asked how quickly the detention center could take in 200 new prisoners, Filostrat replied, “Pretty quickly,” but declined to elaborate, adding, “I have no further instructions. ... We’re doing our job, holding them safely and humanely until we’re told to transfer them or take more.”

The AP (1/26, Tucker) report focuses on President Trumps embrace of “the idea of Guantanamo Bay as a jail for terror suspects,” calling it “a repudiation of the Obama administration’s longtime push to prosecute captured militants in the US court system.” According to the AP, support for the facility “represents a total reversal of eight years of efforts to close it.”

FLORIDA AIRPORT SHOOTER CHARGED WITH MURDER, NOT TERRORISM. The Miami Herald (1/26, Weaver, 856K) reports that “Fort Lauderdale airport shooter Esteban Santiago told federal agents after carrying out his deadly rampage that he was ‘hearing voices,’ under ‘government mind control’ and ‘participating in jihadi chat rooms online’ – but, at least for now, he’s not being charged with a terrorist act.” A federal grand jury on Thursday “returned an indictment that includes no accusation that he was supporting a foreign terrorist group like the Isamic State, as he suggested to FBI agents.” The FBI has “found no evidence on his computer, smart phone or elsewhere to support his claims in a confession-like statement,” and instead, the grand jury “charged the 26-year-old military veteran from Alaska with killing five people and injuring six others during the Jan. 6 shooting at Fort Lauderdale-Hollywood International Airport – with all of the violent attack captured on surveillance video cameras.”

TRUMP EXPECTED TO ASK PENTAGON FOR OPTIONS IN FIGHTING ISIL. The AP (1/26, Baldor) reports President Trump’s Friday visit to the Pentagon is expected to begin a conversation on fulfilling “his inauguration address pledge to eradicate radical Islamic terrorism ‘completely from the face of the Earth.’” Officials says that options are expected to include moves the Obama Administration rejected, such as adding more US troops, increasing military aid to the Kurds, sending more Apache helicopters, and “giving the U.S. military broader authority to make routine combat decisions.”

UN HUMANITARIAN CHIEF ACCUSES SYRIA OF BLOCKING AID CONVOYS. The AP (1/26) reports UN humanitarian chief Stephen O’Brien told the Security Council the Syrian government is, in the AP’s words, “blocking aid to hundreds of thousands” by turning the a two-step approval process for humanitarian convoys into “in practice, a 10-step process.”

BANA AL-ABED URGES TRUMP SAVE SYRIA'S CHILDREN. The New York Times (1/26, Specia, Subscription Publication, 13.9M) reports seven-year-old Bana al-Abed and her mother, Fatemah, posted an open letter to President Trump on Bana's Twitter account on Wednesday, calling for him to help the children of Syria. Bana's Twitter account "captured global attention" with its near-daily updates on life in Eastern Aleppo, although some allege Bana didn't write the tweets and her videos are "rehearsed or altered." Her family eventually fled to Turkey.

PEOPLE RETURNING TO ALEPPO. The Washington Post (1/26, Loveluck, 11.43M) reports that, following Aleppo's recapture by government forces, which "will probably be seen as the defining victory in Syria's almost six-year war," people are returning to the city, although "it will take years, if not decades, to rebuild." According to the United Nations, at least 40,000 people had returned to the area, and "the organization has allocated $19 million in emergency aid" to help them.

DECLASSIFIED CIA DOCS: PINOCHET'S CHILE WANTED SECRET BASE IN MIAMI. The Miami New Times (1/26, Minsky, 175K) reports newly declassified CIA documents show that Miami "was almost a secret base for one of the bloodiest covert operations in Latin America, one that killed tens of thousands of people across a half-dozen countries." The documents show the Chilean secret police, known as La Dirección de Inteligencia Nacional (DINA), sought for a US-sanctioned base in Miami "in the mid-'70s where operatives could carry out missions such as kidnappings and assassinations — a request that was at least considered by U.S. officials." Other documents include details on Operation Condor, based in Chile, which Long Island University professor J. Patrice McSherry said was "really a U.S.-backed 'black operations' campaign." McSherry said of the newly released documents: "One surmises that the information is still sensitive because it indicates that Washington was not only well informed of Condor but also was an unofficial or top-secret sponsor of the cross-border system."

DEFECTOR: ACCESS TO OUTSIDE INFO WILL LEAD NORTH KOREANS TO BRING DOWN KIM JONG-UN. NPR (1/26, 1.92M) reports Thae Yong-ho, the "highest-ranking defector" from North Korea "in decades," argues that bolstering the flow of information into the North will help ultimately bring down the Kim Jong-un regime. On Wednesday, Thae said the first concern his 10- and 26-year-old sons had was whether they could freely browse the Internet, because fewer than one percent of North Korea's population has Internet access. Thae says that breaking down censorship and surveillance in the North will lead to education, and once the population is "educated to that level, I am sure they will stand up."

HERSHKOVITZ: WAYS IC CAN HELP TRUMP ON TERRORISM FRONT. Former IDF intelligence officer Shay Hershkovitz, now a chief strategy officer at Wikistrat, Inc., argues in The Hill (1/26, Hershkovitz, 1.25M) says that to help President Trump implement an effective anti-terror campaign, the intelligence community "needs to emphasize the importance of tackling the root causes that sustain terror. It needs to present to the president and his senior staff a holistic view of terrorism, and insist that decision-makers divorce from one-dimensional perceptions – i.e., 'let's just smoke them out and kill 'em!'" In addition the IC must convey to Trump that a potential counter-terror partnership with Russia "'could easily work against America's interests," because Russia doesn't have the same goals in the Middle East.

MAY COULD STOP INTEL SHARING WITH US IF TORTURE TECHNIQUES RETURN. The Independent (UK) (1/26, Watts, 1.28M) reports British Prime Minister Theresa May "has indicated that the UK could stop working with US intelligence agencies if they adopt torture techniques for extracting information from suspects." During a flight to the US to meet with President Trump, May said the UK's guidelines are "very clear" in saying that the nation's intelligence can't work with other country's agencies that practice torture, and that the current stance will not change. She added, "What we think about torture is we condemn it. We do not believe in torture. That position has been clear for some time and that position is not going to change."

The Guardian (UK) (1/26, Defence, Correspondent, 4.07M) says UK intelligence agencies would face a "major dilemma" if the US did resume such interrogation methods, because the "bulk of the intelligence being assessed by the UK agencies – especially GCHQ but also the overseas agency MI6 and, to a lesser extent, M15 – comes from the US." While none of those agencies would like to lose that access, "if the intelligence had been obtained through torture it would put them in breach of international law."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

However, The Guardian says UK agencies in the past have taken information "that they know comes from countries that use torture," and they could "argue that it is near impossible when sifting through raw data to distinguish what has been freely given and what has been obtained under duress."

FINDYR FOUNDER VINCI NAMED NGA DIRECTOR OF PLANS AND PROGRAMS. ExecutiveGov (1/26, Stump, 548) reports Anthony Vinci, the founder of the crowdsourced data collection firm Findyr, has been appointed to succeed Misty Tullar as the NGA's director of plans and programs. He will assume the role Jan. 30, the NGA said Wednesday. According to ExecutiveGov, NGA Director Cardillo added that Vinci "will support NGA's agile acquisition, modeling, crowdsourcing, code development, disparate data sets and anticipatory analysis efforts."

DRAFT ORDER TO SPUR DEBATE OVER USE OF OFFSHORE MILITARY TRIBUNALS. The AP (1/26, Tucker) reports a draft order that would reverse the Obama Administration's efforts to close Guantanamo Bay, and that "dramatically rethinks how the U.S. should detain, monitor and prosecute terrorist suspects," is "likely to renew a debate" about whether civilian trials or military tribunals offshore "offer a fairer and more efficient path to justice." The article quotes Eric Freedman, a constitutional law professor and legal consultant for Gitmo detainees, who says "groups opposed to American values have made extraordinarily effective use of Guantanamo and its betrayal of American values," adding, "To take a step backward would be both practically misguided and morally indefensible."

MI6 DIRECTOR: JAMES BOND'S "Q" A WOMAN IN REAL LIFE. USA Today (1/26, Onyanga-Omara, 5.28M) reports MI6 Chief Alex Younger on Wednesday told an audience at the Women in IT awards that the James Bond character "Q" is based on a woman, according to the BBC (1/26, 2.39M). USA Today says Younger revealed the information in a speech "encouraging women to join the organization" that provides the British government with foreign intelligence. Citing the BBC, Refinery29 (UK) (1/26, Gil, 5M) reports that Younger said "we've got to get over and see through the Bond thing," and that the character makes people think of a "particular sort of person that will join MI6 – whether they're really posh or going to Oxford." The New York Daily News (1/26, Gunderman, 4.45M) similarly says that Younger "urged more women to join MI6, especially in scientific and technological capacities." Younger said, "If any of you would like to join us...the real-life Q is looking forward to meeting you and I'm pleased to report that the real-life Q is a woman." Younger also told the audience that the James Bond films fail to reflect the true nature of the make up of the intelligence field, saying, "Success for me is a deeper, broader range of technological skills in MI6 and more diversity, in particular more women."

Hollywood Reporter (1/26, Ritman, 1.1M) says "it seems 007 casting directors have been getting one crucial thing wrong" about British intelligence considering the last four Qs have been played by men.

SSCI DEMOCRATS TO TRUMP: READ REPORT ON ENHANCED INTERROGATION. The Hill (1/26, Carney, 1.25M) reports in its "Floor Action" blog that Democratic members of the SSCI are "urging President Trump to read a 2014 report on the CIA's programs before deciding to restart 'enhanced interrogation.'" In a letter to Trump on Thursday, seven senators on the panel, including ranking member Mark Warner, said it is of the "utmost importance" that he read the report's findings. The letter said that the report was intended to be used for any future interrogation guidelines and "remains a critical resource for anyone considering detention and interrogation policy."

The Washington Times (1/26, Taylor, 272K) says the senators "expressed outrage" in their letter after Trump's suggestion that he is contemplating allowing the return a "program that used enhanced interrogation techniques tantamount to torture against terrorism suspects." The letter said, "To avoid making the mistakes of the past, it is of the utmost importance that you familiarize yourself with, and ensure that any Executive Branch officials involved in the formation of detention and interrogation policy review, the full Committee Study." The Times notes that no Republicans signed the letter (independent Sen. Angus King did).

TEAM BEGINS IARPA-BACKED PROJECT TO HELP ANALYSTS ASSESS QUALITY OF INFORMATION. The Syracuse (NY) Post-Standard (1/26, Moriarty, 531K) reports a team from Syracuse University, the University of Arizona, Colorado State University, and SRC Inc. begin work this month on "the 4.5-year project under an $11.5 million contract from" IARPA to develop digital tools that use crowdsourcing to “aid analysts at the nation’s intelligence agencies, including the CIA, FBI, the National Security Agency, Department of Homeland Security and the Drug Enforcement Administration.” Syracuse professor Jennifer Stromer-Galley, who is leading the research team, said the application the team is building “will guide analysts” to evaluate the credibility of the information they’ve obtained, “list the assumptions used in judging the evidence, and identify the information they do not know and determine whether their conclusions might be different if they had the missing information.”

INTEL AGENCIES TOLD TO MAKE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO WIDER IC. Secrecy News (1/26, Aftergood, 2K) reports former DNI James Clapper on Jan. 19 signed Intelligence Community Directive 121, which calls for each intelligence agency “to make information readily discoverable by and appropriately retrievable to the [entire] IC.” Though the directive “has received congressional support and seems likely to continue for the foreseeable future,” Secrecy News says the future of the ODNI itself is uncertain. The article notes that the SSCI last week, in a report on the fiscal year 2017 Intelligence Authorization Act, “mandated a new review of the roles and missions of the ODNI.”

MAY, REPUBLICANS COUNTER TRUMP ON TORTURE. NBC Nightly News (1/26, story 2, 2:20, Holt, 16.61M) that British Prime Minister Theresa May is “is being criticized at home for cozying up to” President Trump, with “[m]any other European leaders disturbed by his proposed ban on Syrian refugees and comments on torture are keeping their distance.” However, ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 3:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported that May told reporters that she disagrees with him on torture. May said, “We condemn torture and my view on that won’t change, whether I’m talking to you or talking to the President of the United States.” Martha Raddatz said that “even Republican leaders are countering President Trump.” Sen. Mitch McConnell, Senate Majority Leader: “I think the Director of the CIA has made it clear he is going to follow along, and I believe virtually all of my members are comfortable with the state of the law on that issue now.” Rep. Paul Ryan, Speaker of the House: “And torture is illegal. Torture is not legal. We agree with it not being legal.”

Fox News’ Special Report (1/26, 1.53M) reported that Defense Secretary Mattis and CIA Director Pompeo “were not part of the initial conversations for” a draft order that would have overseas terror suspects sent to Guantanamo Bay where interrogations “would not be limited to the Army field manual that forbids torture.” White House spokesman Sean Spicer “emphasized that the draft order was not a White House document,” and congressional leadership “says the ideas” in the order “are a non-starter.”

TRUMP: MANNING AN “UNGRATEFUL TRAITOR.” ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 4, 0:20, Muir, 14.63M) reported President Trump came to the “defense of President Obama” after Chelsea Manning “called Mr. Obama a weak leader. Even after he reduced Manning’s sentence for giving thousands of military documents to WikiLeaks.” Trump in a tweet called Manning “an ungrateful traitor.”

SEVERAL STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS RESIGN IN MAJOR SHAKE-UP. ABC World News Tonight (1/26, story 3, 3:35, Muir, 14.63M) reported there was an “unusually large exodus of foreign service officers” from the State Department on Thursday when at least six resigned. Though they were “not technically fired, the appointees were told they would not be asked to stay on in the Trump administration.” Fox News’ Special Report (1/26, 1.53M) said the resignations of the State Department personnel – including four officials “responsible for the department’s daily operations with decades of experience” – come “at a time when the agency doesn’t even have a confirmed secretary to run it.” Former officials reportedly “described the departures as abrupt and extraordinary.”

While reporting that four “top officials” are out at the State Department, CNN’s Anderson Cooper 360 (1/26, 686K) said the White House “usually asks career officials, not political appointees, career officials to stay on for a few months, not leaving a gaping hole in management.” One of those who was told his “services are no longer required” was Acting Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security Tom Countryman, who was informed while en route to a conference in Rome.

Spokesman Says Trump Seeks 20 Percent Tax On Mexican Imports

By Julie Pace, AP White House Correspondent
Associated Press, January 26, 2017

PHILADELPHIA (AP) – President Donald Trump called on fellow Republicans to help him enact "great and lasting change" at a party retreat Thursday but offered few details. Later his spokesman said the president will seek a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports to pay for a proposed border wall.

The president was greeted by cheers as he took the stage in a hotel ballroom, telling senators and House members, "This Congress is going to be the busiest Congress in decades – maybe ever."

He addressed lawmakers shortly after Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto canceled a trip to Washington next week for his first meeting with the new president due to their disagreement over which of their countries would pay to build Trump's promised wall on the border between them.

The wall is part of Trump's plan to halt illegal immigration to the U.S., and he has long insisted that Mexico will pay. Pena Nieto insists his country will not.

On the flight back to Washington, White House spokesman Sean Spicer told reporters traveling with the president that Trump will seek to impose a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports to pay for the wall. Congressional approval would be needed for such a step.

But then later, at the White House, Spicer tried to take back his earlier comments by saying the 20 percent tax is one of several options under consideration and Trump hasn't settled on it as the way to recoup construction costs for building the wall.

In Trump's remarks to lawmakers, he cast the cancellation of his engagement with Pena Nieto as a mutual decision, saying they had "agreed to cancel our planned meeting." Trump had tweeted early Thursday that "it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting" given Pena Nieto's unwillingness to pay for the border wall.

Trump's election put Republicans in control of both the White House and Congress for the first time in more than a decade. Yet Trump's often fluid ideology has sometimes put him at odds with his own party, making agreement on issues including a tax overhaul and entitlements no guarantee.

Addressing fellow Republicans, the president spoke about his agenda in broad terms and then skipped a planned question-and-answer session. He gave the lawmakers no specific marching orders for tackling the repeal and replace of "Obamacare," one of the most complicated issues Congress is expected to tackle this year.

Spicer had said Trump on Thursday would continue to exercise his executive authority to implement his agenda, but an event listed on the president's public schedule was postponed and could now take place on Friday.

The White House is considering steps to commission a probe of widespread voter fraud, restrict the flow of refugees to the U.S., and negotiate individual trade deals with countries that signed the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact. Trump took steps earlier this week to withdraw the U.S. from TPP, saying the agreement puts American workers at a disadvantage.

Trump's brief trip to Philadelphia marked his first flight on Air Force One, the familiar blue and white government plane that has long ferried presidents around the country and the world. Spokesman Sean Spicer described Trump – who traveled throughout the campaign and the transition on his own private jet – as being "in awe" of the presidential aircraft.

Trump saluted as he walked off his Marine helicopter and chatted with an Air Force officer who escorted him to the steps of the plane. He climbed the steps slowly but did not turn around and wave as presidents often do.

Trump May Fund Border Wall With 20 Percent Tax On Mexico Imports

By Justin Sink
Bloomberg Politics, January 26, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Trump administration is considering a 20 percent tax on imports from Mexico to pay for a wall along the southern U.S. border, White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer said.

"When you look at the plan that's taking shape now, using comprehensive tax reform as a means to tax imports from countries that we have a trade deficit from, like Mexico, if you tax that $50 billion at 20 percent of imports," Spicer said, "by doing that we can do $10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. "

Spicer spoke to reporters during President Donald Trump's trip to Philadelphia Thursday to address congressional Republicans at a retreat.

White House: Mexican Import Tax Just One Way To Pay For Wall

By Jordan Fabian

The Hill, January 26, 2017

White House press secretary Sean Spicer on Thursday said imposing a 20 percent tax on imports from Mexico is just one option President Trump is considering to pay for a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border.

Spicer sought to clarify his earlier comments about the plan, saying they were not meant to be an official policy rollout.

"Our job right now isn't to roll something out or be prescriptive," the spokesman told reporters inside his West Wing office. "It's to show that there are ways that the wall could be paid for. Full stop. That's it."

Asked if he was making a formal policy announcement, Spicer flatly said "no."

"The idea was that there have been questions about how the president could pay for the wall," he said. "One idea through comprehensive tax reform is that there could be this idea that Speaker Ryan and others have floated that could generate revenue."

Spicer said earlier Thursday that Trump wanted to tax all imports from Mexico at a 20 percent rate, which he said would generate $10 billion to pay for the wall.

"This is something that we've been in close contact with both houses in moving forward and creating a plan," he told reporters aboard Air Force One.

He said the provision could be included in a comprehensive tax reform package being crafted by congressional Republicans.

"This is the beginning of this plan to make sure it is done right," he said. "But, it clearly provides the funding and does so in a way that ensures that the American taxpayer is wholly respected."

His initial comments came after Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto announced he would not come to Washington for a meeting with Trump after the president said he would move forward with his plan to erect the wall — and make Mexico pay for it.

His move was interpreted as a sign Mexico will resist paying for the barrier.

The tax plan could have far-reaching consequences for American consumers and businesses while exacerbating tensions between Mexico and the U.S.

The plan could benefit exporters, such as U.S.-based aerospace companies, but hurt retailers and other American companies that manufacture goods overseas to sell in the U.S.

That could result in higher prices for American consumer goods.

It could also reduce the number of imports coming into the U.S., which would lessen the amount of revenue collected by the tax.

Spicer's initial comments were met with praise from some close Trump allies in Congress, and puzzlement from others.

The proposal, as originally explained by Spicer, appeared to be similar to a controversial provision that would tax U.S. businesses' imports and credit exports included in a House Republican tax plan.

Trump himself panned that proposal as "too complicated" in a recent interview with the Wall Street Journal.

"Many unanswered questions about proposed 'border adjustment' tax," tweeted John Cornyn (Texas), the number-two Senate Republican.

Sen. Lindsay Graham (R-S.C.), who ran against Trump in the GOP presidential primary, said the tax could hurt companies and consumers on both sides of the border.

"Simply put, any policy proposal which drives up costs of Corona, tequila, or margaritas is a big-time bad idea. Mucho Sad," he tweeted.

Trump Team Floats Tax On Mexican Imports To Fund Border Wall

By Matthew Nussbaum

Politico, January 26, 2017

President Donald Trump supports a tax on imports from Mexico to pay for his proposed border wall, White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Thursday.

"When you look at the plan that's taking shape now, using comprehensive tax reform as a means to tax imports from countries that we have a trade deficit from, like Mexico," Spicer said on the flight back from Philadelphia, where Trump addressed congressional Republicans at their annual retreat. "If you tax that $50 billion at 20 percent of imports — which is by the way a practice that 160 other countries do — right now our country's policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous. By doing it that we can do $10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding."

Story Continued Below

It was not immediately clear whether Spicer was talking about 20 percent tariff on imported goods from Mexico or a more nuanced border adjustment tax on imported goods that goes beyond Mexico.

"This is something that we've been in close contact with both houses in moving forward and creating a plan," Spicer added. "It clearly provides the funding and does so in a way that the American taxpayer is wholly respected."

The proposed tax appears aimed at realizing Trump's longstanding promise that Mexico would pay for the wall. Should companies pass on the cost of the tax to costumers, however, it would mean American consumers were shouldered some or all of the burden.

The announcement comes after Trump took executive actions Wednesday to crack down on illegal immigration, including directing funds to begin construction of the wall. Speaker Paul Ryan told his colleagues in Philadelphia Wednesday that Congress would find a way to pay for the barrier.

Mexican officials have repeatedly said they will not pay for teh wall, and Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto on Thursday cancelled a planned trip to Washington to meet with Trump.

"I've said many times that the American people will not pay for the wall. And I've made that clear to the government of Mexico," Trump said in Philadelphia after news of the cancellation. "To that end, the president of Mexico and myself have agreed to cancel our planned meeting scheduled for next week. Unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless and I want to go a different route. We have no choice."

U.S. Considering 20% Tax On Imports To Pay For Border Wall, White House Says

By Michael A. Memoli

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

The Trump administration said Thursday that it would seek to impose a tax on imports, at least from countries with which the U.S. runs a trade deficit, as a way to pay for the wall on the border with Mexico that is one of President Trump's central campaign promises.

Although Trump repeatedly has said that Mexico would pay for the wall, the tax that White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer described to reporters actually would fall on U.S. consumers, not on Mexicans.

"Right now, our country's policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous," Spicer told reporters traveling with Trump back to Washington after a speech in Philadelphia.

By reversing that and taxing imports, "we can do $10 billion a year, and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding," Spicer said.

Although Spicer did not refer ot the tax by name, his description of it seemed to make clear that he was referring to a complicated portion of the tax reform plan proposed by House Republicans. That was confirmed by House GOP officials, including Speaker Paul Ryan's communications director, Brendan Buck.

The provision, known as a destination-based cash flow tax essentially would function as a national sales tax on imported goods and services. It's a key part of the GOP tax plan, but one that Trump has previously criticized as too complicated. As part of the plan, the House GOP would also lower the corporate tax rate to 20% from its current maximum level of 35%.

Such a tax would likely increase prices on some staples for American consumers, such as tomatoes and avocados, once U.S. retailers pass along the tax to consumers. Mexico is the second-largest supplier of agricultural imports to the U.S.

The price increase for consumers would be at least partially offset by an increased valuation in the dollar, experts have said.

Trump alluded to the plan earlier in remarks to House and Senate Republicans in Philadelphia.

"We're working on a tax reform bill that will reduce our trade deficits, increase American exports and will generate revenue from Mexico that will pay for the wall, if we decide to go that route," Trump said.

The U.S. imported $316.4 billion in goods and services from Mexico in 2015, while exporting $267.2 billion, according to the office of the U.S. Trade Representative. Mexico is the United States' third-largest supplier of imports — chiefly vehicles, electrical machinery and mineral fuels.

Trump Mulls 20% Border Tax On Mexico; Aides Later Call It Just An Option

By Gregory Korte And David Jackson

USA Today, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON — President Trump's plan for a wall along the Mexican border could be financed through a 20% border tax on all imports from the United States' third largest trading partner, the White House said Thursday.

"It clearly provides the funding and does so in a way that the American taxpayer is wholly respected," White House press secretary Sean Spicer said. "We are probably the only major country that doesn't treat imports this way."

But shortly after he announced the proposal in an unscheduled "gaggle" with reporters on Air Force One, Spicer clarified to a separate group of reporters in the West Wing that it was just one proposal. "There are clearly a bunch of ways it can be done," he said. "The point is American taxpayers are not going to fund it."

White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus added that it was part of a "buffet of options."

The unexpected proposal and subsequent backtracking underscored just how quickly the Trump White House is churning out policy proposals in a hectic first week in office, with a crowded calendar of meetings, speeches and executive actions.

The border tax plan would need congressional approval, and Spicer described it as the beginning of a process that would be part of overall tax reform. The tax proposal would have the benefit of dovetailing two of his signature policies: Curtailing illegal immigration and enacting more protectionist trade regulations.

But the proposal could face resistance even among Republicans.

"Border security yes, tariffs no," Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., wrote on Twitter. "Simply put, any policy proposal which drives up costs of Corona, tequila, or margaritas is a big-time bad idea. Mucho Sad."

The U.S. trade deficit with Mexico is was $49.2 billion in 2015, according to the U.S. Trade Representative. Though Spicer didn't explain how the tax would work, the principle is similar to a border adjustment tax currently being discussed in Congress, which would heavily tax imports but give a tax credit on exports.

"Right now our country's policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous," Spicer said.

Spicer ran through the math by applying 20% to the difference, coming up with nearly $10 billion a year.

The United States could "easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding," he said.

Actual imports from Mexico totaled $316.4 billion in 2015.

White House Press Secretary Says Border Wall Will Be Funded By 20 Percent Import Tax On Mexican Goods

By Joshua Partlow

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

MEXICO CITY — President Enrique Peña Nieto on Thursday called off a trip to Washington, after President Trump launched his plan to construct a border wall and insisted he would stick Mexico with the bill. The incident opened one of the most serious rifts in memory between the United States and its southern neighbor.

Trump spokesman Sean Spicer added a stunning new detail about the proposed wall project later Thursday, saying that Trump intended to pay for it by imposing a 20 percent tax on all imports from Mexico.

Peña Nieto had been scheduled to meet with Trump on Tuesday to discuss immigration, trade and drug-war cooperation. He called off the visit after Trump tweeted that it would be "better to cancel the upcoming meeting" if Mexico was unwilling to pay for the wall.

Trump's moves have rekindled old resentments in Mexico, a country that during its history has often felt bullied and threatened by its wealthier, more powerful neighbor. The legacy of heavy-handed U.S. behavior — which includes invasions and the seizure of significant Mexican lands — has mostly been played down by a generation of Mexican leaders who have pursued pragmatic policies and mutual economic interests with both Republican and Democratic U.S. administrations.

Both Peña Nieto and Spicer said their countries were interested in maintaining positive relations. "We will keep the lines of communication open," Spicer told reporters in Washington on Thursday morning, adding that the White House would "look for a date to schedule something in the future." The Mexican president tweeted that his government was willing to work with the United States "to reach agreements that benefit both nations."

But Mexicans expressed shock and dismay as Trump moved to turn his campaign promises into reality.

Mexicans view a wall across the 2,000-mile border as a symbolic affront, part of a package of Trump policies that could cause the country serious economic pain. They include a crackdown on illegal immigrants, who send billions of dollars home, and renegotiation of the North American Free Trade Agreement, or NAFTA.

The treaty has allowed trade between the neighbors to mushroom. Every day, goods valued at $1.4 billion cross the U.S.-Mexico border, and millions of jobs are linked to trade on both sides. Mexico is the world's second-largest customer for American-made products, and 80 percent of Mexican exports — automobiles, flat-screen TVs, avocados — are sold to the United States.

"When we are talking about building a wall, about deporting migrants, about eliminating sanctuary cities [for migrants], about threatening to end a free-trade agreement, or to take away factories, we are really talking about causing human suffering," Margarita Zavala, a possible candidate for the presidency in 2018 and the wife of former president Felipe Calderón, said in an interview. "And after today, without a doubt, it is very difficult to negotiate from behind a wall."

Mexicans had trouble recalling a time when relations were this bad with the United States or when an American president appeared to be such a threat to Mexico's core interests.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"Never," former president Vicente Fox said in an interview, when asked if Mexico had faced a comparable U.S. president in his lifetime. "And I never thought the U.S. people would go for a president like this."

"We don't want the ugly American, which Trump represents: that imperial gringo that used to invade our country, that used to send the Marines, that used to put and take away presidents most everywhere in the world," Fox added. "That happened in the 20th century, and this is what this guy is menacing us with."

Trump, for his part, faulted the Mexicans for damaging the relationship.

Addressing a GOP policy retreat in Philadelphia, Trump said Thursday afternoon, "The president of Mexico and myself have agreed to cancel our planned meeting" next Tuesday. "Unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless," he added.

It was not clear exactly how the Trump administration would impose the new tax on Mexican exports. But Spicer said it would be part of a broader plan to tax imports from countries, including Mexico, with which the United States has a trade deficit.

"If you tax that $50 billion at 20 percent of imports — which is, by the way, a practice that 160 other countries do — right now our country's policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous," Spicer told reporters. "By doing it that way, we can do $10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding."

Peña Nieto's decision to cancel the trip came a day after Trump signed an executive order to construct a border wall, one of Trump's signature promises and a rallying cry for his supporters during last year's presidential campaign. Trump has insisted that Mexico will fund it, but Peña Nieto and other Mexican officials have angrily denied they will do so.

The timing of the order was seen as further insult: Foreign Minister Luis Videgaray was flying to Washington on Tuesday when news broke about Trump's impending border wall announcement. All day Wednesday, speculation was rampant that Peña Nieto might cancel his upcoming trip.

In the meantime, Videgaray met at the White House with Craig Deare, who is in charge of Latin America on the National Security Council.

Throughout Trump's rise, Peña Nieto has been mostly respectful toward him, even inviting him to visit Mexico City as a candidate last August. Peña Nieto has tried to maintain a diplomatic approach to the new administration, suggesting that Mexico can negotiate with its largest trading partner and preserve good relations.

On Wednesday night, Peña Nieto sent out a recorded message saying that he "regrets and disapproves" of the U.S. decision to move forward with the wall. He repeated that Mexico will not pay for the wall but said he still planned to come to Washington to meet with Trump because of the importance of the negotiations.

But that decision changed after Trump's tweet on Thursday morning.

During his speech at the GOP policy retreat later in the day in Philadelphia, Trump described NAFTA as a "terrible deal, a total disaster for the United States," and said that the move of manufacturing to Mexico cost millions of American jobs and the closure of "thousands and thousands of plants" across the United States.

White House Plans To Pay For Border Wall With 20 Percent Tariff On Mexican Imports

By Cameron Joseph, New York Daily News

New York Daily News, January 26, 2017

The White House announced they plan to pay for a border wall with a 20% tariff on all goods coming in from Mexico, the latest salvo in an escalating feud between President Trump and the U.S.'s southern neighbor that could escalate into a trade war.

"When you look at the plan that's taking shape now, using comprehensive tax reform as a means to tax imports from countries that we have a trade deficit from, like Mexico," White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer announced to reporters aboard Air Force One, shortly after Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto announced he was canceling a planned visit to President Trump.

"If you tax that $50 billion at 20 percent of imports — which is by the way a practice that 160 other countries do — right now our country's policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous. By doing it that way, we can do $10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding," Spicer continued.

To do so, Trump would need to pull out of the North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico and Canada, which bans unilateral decisions on new taxes and tariffs between the countries. Congress would also have to approve the plan — a murky proposition even with the GOP-controlled House and Senate.

campaign promises to crack down on immigrants, build a wall along the Mexican border and renegotiate NAFTA.

Counting The Winners And Losers From An Import-Based Tax

By Keith Bradsher, Rachel Abrams And Bill Vlasic
New York Times, January 26, 2017

The idea of a broad tax on importers is suddenly at the center of the Washington policy debate, with the inevitable counting of potential winners and losers.

Such a tax could hit retailers the hardest if it takes full effect, with their heavy reliance on products as varied as microwave ovens from China and T-shirts from Bangladesh. But few sectors of the American economy and few consumers would be unaffected.

If such a tax were imposed on imports from around the world, automakers could face hefty tax bills not only for cars imported from Mexico and elsewhere but also for the many auto parts they buy from overseas for their assembly lines in the United States. Chemical companies, supplying practically every industry, could find themselves paying more for feedstocks. And energy companies could wind up paying more for imported oil.

The Republican leadership of the House Ways and Means Committee has been working in recent months on such a plan, a border-adjusted tax, as part of an effort to cut corporate tax rates. On Thursday, the plan got caught up in a discussion of ways to make Mexico pay for a proposed border wall, before the White House stepped back from endorsing that course.

If a border-adjusted tax is used to offset a reduction in corporate tax rates, American exporters and their employees would rank among the winners.

Yet, even in its broader form, the tax plan could be politically tricky. If a tax covers oil imports, for example, it would end up falling most heavily on rural Americans, who voted heavily for President Trump but also tend to drive farther each year than residents of heavily Democratic large cities.

The tax "would be a boon for producers but it would be a negative for consumers — it's going to hit the pocketbooks of his supporters the hardest," said Ed Hirs, a managing director of Hillhouse Resources, an oil and gas company based in Houston.

Even those seemingly safe from import taxes, exporters like Boeing and American farmers, could also lose sales if other countries retaliated. Banks on Wall Street could lose overseas contracts to represent initial public offerings if foreign governments responded by steering their companies to European or Asian rivals.

By international standards, the United States puts few taxes on consumption, while taxing producers more heavily. The House Republican proposal would start to shift that balance, and one likely effect would be somewhat higher prices at retailers including gas stations and Walmart.

Many small manufacturers without overseas factories have long favored an overhaul of the United States tax code that would increase corporate taxes on importers. The money raised from such a tax increase, they have argued, could then be used to offset a reduction in the overall corporate tax rate of 35 percent.

Powerful business groups like the American Chamber of Commerce have said little about such proposals, because of deep divisions in corporate America based on who would pay the import tax and who might benefit from a reduction in corporate taxes.

But Mr. Trump and his spokesman, Sean Spicer, may have complicated the House Republicans' efforts by raising the possibility of imposing such a tax on goods from Mexico first, with the money used to pay for a wall along the Mexican border to deter illegal immigration. The White House later said it was just one of the methods being considered.

Linking the plan to Mexico left corporate groups mostly silent, leery of offending the president by criticizing him but also leery of offending Americans who dislike Mr. Trump's denunciations of Mexico and Mexican immigrants.

Industrial labor unions in the United States have been more open to increased taxes on imports from Mexico. After the November election, Dennis Williams, president of the United Automobile Workers, expressed support generally for the president's advocacy of tariffs on Mexican imports.

"I think his position on trade is right on," Mr. Williams said.

If a tax is imposed, the retailing industry, and particularly apparel retailers, could be among the hardest hit. Much of the clothing sold in the United States is made overseas, and retailers have little wiggle room to raise their prices to compensate for higher costs.

And the timing could not be worse: Retailers, particularly apparel companies and department stores, have struggled more than other sectors of the economy to recover from the recession.

Tighter budgets, Amazon and many new discount chains have conditioned shoppers never to pay full price. In recent years, that has created a discounting war that has decimated once-mighty retail titans like Macy's and other department stores.

Could those same stores start charging more because of the proposed plan to raise the costs on imports?

Unthinkable.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But David French, senior vice president of government relations at the National Retail Federation, said that retailers would have no choice but to raise prices.

"I really hope everybody understands that what they're really talking about is a 20 percent tax on the U.S. consumer," he said on Thursday. "That's like building the wall and having the U.S. consumer pay for it."

But even if a 20 percent tax on imports were imposed, its effect on retail prices would be far smaller in percentage terms. That is because the value of imports is essentially calculated based on their wholesale value, which may be a quarter or less of the retail price for items like apparel. So the extra tax would fall on only a small share of the total costs of most companies.

Apparel companies could be among the most vulnerable if corporate taxes rise for importers of goods from all over the world, since many of the clothes sold in the United States come from China or Bangladesh. Budget-friendly retailers in particular run the risk of alienating customers by raising costs.

But while most of the retail industry is alarmed at the thought of higher import taxes, some retailers could actually win if the Republican plan goes through. Stores that operate primarily in the United States and cater to less price-sensitive shoppers could actually see their profits increase, according to some estimates. That is because the imported goods they sell actually make up a small share of their overall costs, while they spend heavily on attractive stores, American staff wages and marketing promotions.

The beauty retailer Ulta is one such company, according to Goldman Sachs, which predicted that net income could actually rise by 21 percent.

Ulta sells thousands of cosmetics from brands like Chloe and Clinique, many of which depend on overseas factories, according to the company's financial filings. But Ulta may benefit more from the part of the House Republican proposal that would reduce the 35 percent corporate tax rate.

As for the higher import taxes, "they can actually pass along some of the price," Simeon Siegel, a retailing analyst with the investment bank Nomura, said.

By contrast, a tax on imports from Mexico could wreak havoc on finely balanced supply chains in the auto industry. More than two million Mexican-made vehicles were sold in the United States in 2015, according to the International Trade Administration, representing a little over a tenth of the American market. The products range from full-size pickup trucks made by General Motors and Fiat Chrysler, midsize sedans produced by Ford, and small cars assembled by foreign automakers such as Honda and Nissan.

Some automakers are more vulnerable than others. The German automaker Volkswagen, for example, imports more than 30 percent of the vehicles it sells in the United States from Mexico. The figure is closer to 15 percent for the two largest American auto companies, G.M. and Ford.

A 20 percent tariff would probably have to be passed on, at least in part, to consumers. That could add thousands of dollars to the sticker price of affected vehicles — and perhaps cause sharp declines in their sales.

Mexico also exports about $50 billion in auto parts annually to the United States for use in American assembly plants. Tariffs on those parts would add significant costs to American-built vehicles that use them.

Mr. Trump's repeated criticisms of Mexican exports to the United States have prompted several automakers, including the big Detroit companies, to announce plans to increase investment and jobs in their American factories.

Sergio Marchionne, chief executive of Fiat Chrysler, said Thursday that policies that force car companies to curtail or abandon Mexican production would have a major impact on the industry.

"The question about repatriation of all of the manufacturing footprint into the United States has got monumental consequences to the industry over all," Mr. Marchionne said in a conference call with analysts

Trump Endorses Plan For 20% Tax On All Imports

By Michael D. Shear

New York Times, January 26, 2017

PHILADELPHIA — President Trump plans to make Mexico pay for his border wall by imposing a 20 percent tax on all imports into the United States from Mexico, raising billions of dollars that would cover the cost of the new barrier.

The proposal, which Sean Spicer, the White House press secretary, said the president discussed privately with congressional Republicans before giving remarks at a party retreat here, would be a major new economic proposal that could have far-reaching implications for consumers, manufacturers and relations between the two governments.

Mr. Spicer said the 20 percent tax on annual Mexican imports would raise $10 billion a year and would easily pay for a border wall that is estimated to cost between $8 billion and $20 billion. The value of imported goods from Mexico in 2015 was $296 billion. Mr. Spicer said taxing imports is something that 160 other countries already do.

The new tax would be imposed on Mexico as part of a tax overhaul that Mr. Trump intends to pursue with the Republican Congress. Mr. Spicer said the tax initially would apply only to Mexico, but that the president supports imposing a 20 percent tax on all imports.

Mr. Trump would need new legislation to enact such a comprehensive tax on Mexican imports.

Trump Eyes Tax On Mexican Imports To Pay For Wall

By Stephen Dinan

Washington Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump is considering a plan to tax imports from Mexico and using the money to build his promised border wall, the White House said Thursday.

Spokesman Sean Spicer said a 20 percent tax would amount to billions of dollars a year, which could "easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone."

"That's really going to provide the funding," he said.

Donald Trump Administration Floats 20 Percent Mexico Import Tax To Pay For Border Wall

President Donald Trump is considering a 20 percent tax on Mexican imports to pay for a wall along America's southern border, White House press secretary Sean Spicer said Thursday, sparking questions about what exactly the proposal would entail and whether it would place the burden of paying for the barrier on American taxpayers.

Spicer told reporters on Air Force One that the Trump administration has been speaking with lawmakers about including a tax on products shipped to the U.S. from Mexico as part of a broader tax reform package.

Spicer said the move would generate "$10 billion a year and easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone."

"That's really going to provide the funding," he said. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., on Thursday estimated the border wall would cost between $12 billion and $15 billion to complete.

Spicer later attempted to walk back his comments, saying the 20 percent tax is just one of multiple options on the table. White House chief of staff Reince Priebus also was later quoted as saying the proposal is part of a "buffet" of options open to the administration.

Spicer's comments came after a meeting between Trump and Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto set for next week was canceled, notably on the heels of Trump signing an order aimed at moving forward construction of the border wall and continuing to insist that Mexico in some form would foot the bill. Throughout his campaign, Trump had promised to force Mexico to pay for a border wall, though he also has said Mexico would pay for it over time.

The limited details of the plan as put forward by Spicer appeared to fall in line with a border-adjustment tax proposal championed by House Speaker Paul Ryan as part of a wider tax reform plan that would lower the corporate tax rate to 20 percent. In a tweet Thursday, Doug Andres, a Ryan spokesman, seemed to confirm as much.

Earlier this month, Trump criticized the border-adjustment idea as "too complicated," yet he also seemed to reference it while addressing congressional Republicans at a retreat in Philadelphia on Thursday.

"We're working on a tax reform bill that will reduce our trade deficits, increase American exports and will generate revenue from Mexico that will pay for the wall if we decide to go that route," Trump said.

Under Ryan's border-adjustment proposal, goods would be taxed based on where they are "consumed rather than where they are produced," effectively exempting American-made products and services from export taxes while levying taxes on imports to the country.

"Under the plan, all imports coming into the United States would be subject to the 20 percent tax, but exports would have the tax refunded – making them tax-free," Marc Thiessen, a resident fellow at conservative-leaning think tank the American Enterprise Institute, wrote in an op-ed earlier this month in The Washington Post about the plan put forward by Republicans. "Supporters see it as a way for Trump to follow through on his campaign pledge to tax imports and support exports without resorting to tariffs that would provoke a massive global trade fight."

The U.S. imported more than $270 billion in Mexican goods between January and November of last year, according to the Census Bureau, with products ranging from cars and trucks to refrigerators, tomatoes and medical instruments. America in the past two years also has run a trade deficit with its southern neighbor in the range of $50 billion to $60 billion, which – under the border-adjustment plan – would lead to tax revenue of roughly $10 billion to $12 billion, or the amount Spicer cited that would fund the wall.

Advocates argue this system wouldn't increase prices that consumers pay because the value of the dollar would naturally rise. But given the multitude of factors at play in determining currency strength – and the reduced demand for U.S. exports that comes with a strong dollar – opponents argue that U.S. consumers could still be at risk of paying higher prices on imports or facing complications from a significantly stronger dollar.

Indeed, the possible border-adjustment plan was met with skepticism from some congressional lawmakers following Spicer's comments.

Making Mexico Pay For Border Wall: Ideas Abound, And So Do Barriers

By Eduardo Porter

New York Times, January 26, 2017

Will President Trump be able to make Mexico pay for his "big, beautiful wall"? Over the course of his campaign he offered a variety of ways to dip into pots of Mexican money.

The latest, proposed on Thursday, was a 20 percent tax on imports from Mexico, which total roughly $300 billion in goods and services.

Like other proposals Mr. Trump has floated — impounding remittances of Mexicans working in the United States, or charging Mexicans more for visas — it seems straightforward. But carrying it out would be another matter.

For starters, a 20 percent tax on imports from Mexico would violate the North American Free Trade Agreement and most likely the rules of the World Trade Organization, which frowns on punitive levies imposed arbitrarily on imports from specific countries. (It is hard to tell from the tangle of announcements from Mr. Trump and his advisers whether they are planning a broad new tax regime that would affect all exports and imports. That, too, would most likely invite challenges at the W.T.O.)

Mr. Trump, of course, has also talked about taking the United States out of the global trade accord. But that might seem a bit too drastic just to get Mexico to pay perhaps $20 billion for a wall. It is likely to impose enormous costs on the American and world economies, opening the door for a free-for-all trade war. But if the president did it anyway, the people paying the 20 percent tariff would not be Mexicans, but American consumers. That 2017 Ford Fusion built in Hermosillo, Mexico? It would no longer cost $22,610. It would cost $27,132.

So what about the other ideas? The big one Mr. Trump mentioned early on is remittances. Mexico receives about $25 billion a year from Mexicans living abroad, mostly in the United States, in myriad transfers of a few hundred dollars apiece channeled primarily through services like Western Union and MoneyGram.

Mr. Trump originally threatened to simply impound remittances, a matter of dubious legal standing and some logistical complication. Later he suggested a more sophisticated strategy. He would just threaten to change rules under the Patriot Act antiterrorism law to prohibit immigrants who couldn't prove legal residence from wiring money abroad. Under threat of losing these resources, the reasoning went, the Mexican government would soon cave and offer to pay for the wall.

Remittances are indeed a big deal for Mexico. In a foreign policy speech delivered on Monday, President Enrique Peña Nieto said that ensuring "the free flow of remittances from our compatriots living in the United States" was one of 10 core Mexican objectives in the renegotiation of its relationship with America.

What Mr. Trump seems not to reckon with is that people find a way around barriers like these. Mexicans would come up with other conduits to send the $100 a week that their parents, children or siblings back home rely on to pay the bills. As the Government Accountability Office noted in a report published last year, these sorts of obstacles often have the effect of "pushing remittances out of formal financial systems to less detectable methods."

Or what about taxing remittances instead of impounding them? As Oklahoma discovered when it briefly imposed a fee on money transfers abroad in 2010, that would drive remittances into some other, untaxed channel. As Monica de Bolle of the Peterson Institute for International Economics notes, it might also reduce remittances, hitting consumption in Mexico and thus, probably, American exports.

And it might be illegal, too. Kathleen Newland of the Migration Policy Institute, a nonpartisan research group, said that taxing remittances just to Mexico would probably be challenged as discriminatory on the basis of national origin. After all, many people who send remittances are American citizens or legal residents. Taxing remittances only by illegal immigrants would be, to say the least, implausible.

What about charging Mexicans more for visas and border cards? It would take a lot of them to add up to the cost of Mr. Trump's barrier. What's more, visa fees are dedicated by statute to finance United States consular activities around the world.

Mr. Trump could probably find some Mexican money somewhere. Twelve million Mexicans live in the United States. Mexican companies have invested nearly $20 billion in the country. There are tons of flows of money between the two. The question is whether Mr. Trump can get at it without breaking the law.

Gordon Hanson of the University of California, San Diego, notes that the two countries have an income tax treaty. That means that Washington agrees to tax Mexican residents subject to United States income tax at a reduced rate.

"I suppose Trump could simply violate this treaty and subject Mexican residents in the United States at a higher rate and call this part of the payment," he said.

Perhaps none of this matters. Mr. Trump has acknowledged that how Mexico pays might be complicated, which suggests he may be open to calling any flow of money part of this payment. Or as Edward Alden of the Council on Foreign Relations suggests, Mr. Trump may not actually be looking for good ideas to subtly draw money from Mexico to pay for a wall, but instead to prove strength and to humiliate the United States' southern neighbor.

"Trump is focused on the optics," he said. "He is not in the market for clever schemes."

Maybe cutting all aid to Mexico could help serve this purpose. It wouldn't pay for much. And it would amount to shooting oneself in the foot. What little aid Mexico gets from Washington is mostly destined to help finance Mexico's efforts to stop migrants from El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras from traveling across Mexico and into the United States.

But that might not matter anymore. When the dust settles on Mr. Trump's rearrangement of relations with Mexico, Mexico is unlikely to keep lending a hand. The United States' most effective tool to curb illegal immigration will be lost. And then his wall might come in handy.

Yes, Trump Will Build His Border Wall. Most Of It Is Already Built.

By E.j. Graff

Washington Post, November 21, 2016

Can Donald Trump actually keep his pledge to build a Southern border wall?

"Build that wall! Build that wall!" was a favorite chant at Trump campaign rallies. As a real estate developer, this would be his most impressive construction job. As he said early in his campaign, "I would build a great wall, and nobody builds walls better than me, believe me, and I build them very inexpensively."

Critics were as dismissive of Trump's wall as they were of Trump as a presidential candidate. The wall proposal, they said, was nothing more than a political fantasy.

But under President Trump, the wall will not only be for real, but it may be one of his biggest political successes. Here's how.

Whatever is built or is already there, Trump will call it a wall

Words matter. When one thinks of a wall, one thinks of something solid — which, no doubt, is part of its enormous political appeal for Trump supporters. But the term "wall" is actually surprisingly fuzzy. The various Oxford dictionary definitions of a wall include "any high vertical surface, especially one that is imposing in scale." That broad definition would seem to leave Trump a lot of wiggle room.

It is important to remember that Trump's predecessors carefully avoided calling any new border barriers a "wall." Before Trump, the term was politically taboo, viewed as sending the wrong message to Mexico and to the world. When Pat Buchanan ran for president in 1996, he proposed building a "sea wall" to stop the "tidal wave" of illegal immigration across the border — and was dismissed as an extremist and ostracized by the Republican Party.

But times have changed. Trump broke the taboo. His fans have loved him for it. So regardless of what Trump ends up building, calling it a "wall" will sound like something new and make his followers cheer.

Much of the wall has already been built

Since the early 1990s, politicians of all stripes have scrambled to show their commitment to border security. During that time, annual federal funding for border and immigration control mushroomed from $1.5 billion to $19.5 billion. According to one estimate, Washington spends $5 billion more on border and immigration control than for all other federal law enforcement combined.

And the result? Hundreds of miles of metal barriers have gone up. Technologies initially developed for the military have been adapted for border enforcement. A fleet of manned and unmanned aircraft have been deployed to monitor from the air. Thousands of new agents have been hired. The size of the Border Patrol doubled in the 1990s and has more than doubled again since the beginning of the century, from about 4,000 personnel to more than 21,000.

This massive enforcement buildup has been lethal for many migrants trying to cross, with thousands of deaths to date, while enriching the smugglers on whom migrants must rely. As I showed in my book "Border Games: Policing the U.S. Mexico Divide," it has been politically rewarding for both Democrats and Republicans alike. Trump is simply taking it to the next level.

Trump has dismissed the current state of border security as "a joke," but he'll soon find that the bipartisan border policing boom started in the 1990s will be crucial to keeping his wall pledge. Trump's plan calls for a wall that covers 1,000 miles of the nearly 2,000-mile-long border — with natural obstacles covering the remainder. Nearly 700 miles of various types of border fencing are already in place, and portions of it very much look like a formidable metal wall. It is hard to imagine Trump tearing all that fencing up and starting from scratch.

What's much more realistic is that Trump will simply add more miles of fencing; reinforce existing fencing in key, visible places; and deploy even more border guards, stadium lighting, and the latest high-tech detection and surveillance equipment. The newest, tallest part of the Trump Wall — probably erected at one of the most visible, urban spots on the border — would be an effective backdrop for the president's celebratory news conference announcing its construction.

In the end, Trump's wall is likely to be the latest addition to the border barrier-building frenzy first launched by President Bill Clinton, greatly expanded by George W. Bush and continued by Obama. But Trump will take full ownership of it as the only president willing to actually call it a wall.

It will not stop migrants from entering the country illegally — going over, under or around it, with many of them dying in the process. But when Trump supporters grumble that the wall is too porous, Trump will no doubt promise to make the wall even longer, taller and stronger in his second term.

Trump's Wall Is A Huge Waste Of Money: Our View

USA Today, January 26, 2017

Since 2005, the federal government has added hundreds of miles of walls and fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. It has doubled the size of the Border Patrol by hiring more than 10,000 agents. And it has ramped up spending so rapidly that it is plagued with duplicative programs.

So when President Trump says he is moving ahead with a massive border wall, it has all the hallmarks of a multibillion dollar boondoggle. And his insistence that Mexico be forced to pay for his costly campaign pledge threatens to rupture relations with an important ally and trading partner.

Physical barriers certainly have a significant place in border security. But any major expansion of the existing barriers should be done in the context of cost-benefit analysis. By any reasonable accounting, the surge of spending on border enforcement has already reached a point of diminishing return.

The federal government now spends more policing immigration than it does on all other law enforcement activities — combined. More, that is, than on drug trafficking, gangs, counterfeiting, identity theft, financial fraud, would-be assassins, routine interstate crime, illegal arms sales, computer hacking, corporate malfeasance, government corruption and the domestic part of the war on terror.

Most of California, Arizona and New Mexico already have some kind of barrier. Texas is another matter, thanks to the difficulties of building along the snaking, flood-prone Rio Grande River, and the fact that much of the border land is in private hands.

Since 2007, the estimated number of undocumented immigrants has dropped from 12.2 million to slightly more than 11 million, thanks to some combination of increased enforcement, declining birth rates and rising economies, particularly Mexico's.

This isn't to say illegal immigration has stopped outright. But it is being offset by people returning to their home countries. What's more, an estimated 35% to 50% of the inflow is people who come in legally and overstay their visas, people who are not impacted by walls or other border control efforts.

Taking all this into account, Trump's wall would be a colossal waste of money. His idea of forcing Mexico to pay for it has already led to cancellation of next week's scheduled meeting between Trump and Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto. Slapping a 20% tax on imports from Mexico, which a Trump spokesman floated Thursday as a way to recoup the construction costs, would set off a mutually destructive trade war and effectively make U.S. consumers pick up the tab.

Cracking down on visa overstays and on employers who hire illegal workers would do far more to improve immigration enforcement than spending an additional $12 billion or more on steel and concrete.

How To Interpret The Trump Administration's Latest Signals On Mexico

By Neil Irwin

New York Times, January 26, 2017

The White House floated an idea on Thursday afternoon that, in initial reports, sounded like a major tariff on Mexican imports — something that would have gone a long way toward unwinding one of the United States' deepest economic relationships.

The reality of what Sean Spicer, the press secretary, suggested is a lot less dramatic. But it sends important signals about how people in the Trump administration are thinking about overhauling the tax code — and how they're thinking about claiming victory on some of the president's audacious campaign promises. It is a sign of just how fluid things are in this moment when so much of American public policy around taxes, trade and diplomacy is in flux.

Mr. Spicer suggested a way the administration could accomplish President Trump's goal of building a border wall paid for by Mexico. A 20 percent tax on imports from Mexico would do the trick, Mr. Spicer said.

That might sound as if Mr. Spicer was proposing that the United States slap a new tariff meant to punish Mexican exporters. Such a move would result in higher prices for American consumers, create profound challenges for industries with supply chains that span the border, and possibly prompt the collapse of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

But you get a different picture when you put Mr. Spicer's words into the context of the rapidly evolving debate in Washington around overhauling corporate taxation.

He was pointing out that in an overhaul of taxes that House Republicans are considering, imports from all countries would be taxed at 20 percent while American exports would be tax free. It's called border adjustment, and it would make the United States corporate tax code more closely resemble the value-added tax that is commonplace in other countries.

House Republicans see the policy as a way to reshape the tax code to give businesses less incentive to move operations overseas while also generating revenue they can use to reduce tax rates.

Opponents of the plan, which include major retailers, are skeptical. Among the risks: It could drive up consumer prices for all sorts of imported goods, from German cars to Mexican avocados, if the dollar does not rise as much as economists predict. And the policy may violate World Trade Organization rules, which could tangle it up in legal proceedings.

But that Mr. Spicer was floating that plan as a way to fulfill Mr. Trump's Mexican wall promises is interesting on two levels.

First, less than two weeks ago, the then-president-elect threw cold water on the House plan. "Anytime I hear border adjustment, I don't love it," Mr. Trump told The Wall Street Journal. "Because usually it means we're going to get adjusted into a bad deal."

On Thursday, Mr. Spicer was explicitly suggesting that a border tax could be used to pay for a border wall. Referring to the tax plan, he said, "This is something that we've been in close contact with both houses in moving forward."

The border adjustment strategy has plenty of enemies, and there's no certainty that it will become part of a tax overhaul bill. But the latest tea leaves suggest the administration is more open to it than it may have seemed.

The second lesson from the incident is that the Trump administration looks inclined to be flexible in finding ways to satisfy campaign promises without doing major damage to the economy or international relations.

Thursday was one of the roughest days for relations between the United States and Mexico in some time, with the cancellation of a planned visit by President Enrique Peña Nieto and tough talk from Mexico City, which adamantly refuses to pay for an expansion of a border wall.

But Mr. Spicer's comments, which he later said were meant more to offer an example than a concrete policy proposal, suggest that the administration will look for creative ways to proclaim victory on Trumpian promises. In other words, he will proclaim that Mexico has paid for the wall as promised — even if the Mexican government never literally cuts a check to pay for new concrete.

Advocates of the border adjustment tax have been fond of it because it would produce enough revenue to allow a deep reduction in tax rates. But money is fungible. So if the president can claim political victory by stating that the revenue from Mexican imports is going to pay for the wall, no one is going to stop him.

It is a messy time for the making of economic policy. The Trump campaign was notoriously light on policy detail, and the Trump administration still has many key vacancies in economic policy jobs. Nominees for Treasury secretary, commerce secretary and U.S. trade representative have not yet been confirmed, and key jobs on the Council of Economic Advisers and most undersecretary and assistant secretary jobs remain unfilled.

So the gaps are still being filled in on what the Trump administration economic policy will really mean in practice. The way to read the latest Mexico comments is as one more hint.

Donald Trump's Executive Orders: More Symbol Than Substance

By Emily Cadei

Newsweek, January 26, 2017

President Donald Trump has signed a flurry of executive orders and presidential memoranda since his swearing-in January 20—a sign of "bold action," according to his White House. But despite the pomp and circumstance of the signing ceremonies and the accompanying headlines, they do little, on their own, to advance Trump's main policy goals.

Instead, presidential scholars and policy analysts say, they are more about sending a message and setting a direction. The symbolism alone is not inconsequential, however, especially considering what it says to leaders abroad. Try Newsweek: Subscription offers

"The number and the scope of what he's doing is completely normal" when compared with past presidents, "and by and large insignificant," says professor Jeffrey Engel, director of the Center for Presidential History at Southern Methodist University.

George Washington University professor Matthew Dalleck has a slightly different take. "I think they are substantive, but their substance is limited," he says.

The two presidential historians agree, however, that regardless of whether it's Trump's first order—to rein in Obamacare—or Wednesday's orders to build a wall along the border with Mexico and shift immigration enforcement priorities, it will be up to the president's Cabinet officials and Congress to follow through on most of the actual policymaking.

There are plenty of potential obstacles. The executive order Trump issued Wednesday calling for the secretary of homeland security "to immediately plan, design, and construct a physical wall along the southern border" offers no cost estimate—which experts warn could be prohibitive—and it does not suggest where the money would come from. White House spokesman Sean Spicer has reiterated the idea that Mexico will ultimately pay for the wall "one way or another," but in the meantime, it will fall to American taxpayers and Congress to foot the bill. Some spendthrift Republicans could balk if the price tag spirals out of control.

Trump's order instituting a federal hiring freeze, meanwhile, includes several loopholes, granting agencies exemptions for "any positions that it deems necessary to meet national security or public safety responsibilities." The Office of Personnel Management may also grant exemptions when "otherwise necessary."

Even pending orders, drafts of which have been leaked to the press, are limited in scope. An executive order following Trump's promise of a so-called Muslim ban will last only 30 days and target just seven war-torn countries in the Middle East and North Africa that supply a relatively small number of immigrants—roughly 50,000 in 2015, or 5 percent of the more than 1 million foreigners granted permanent legal status. It does not include far larger Muslim-majority countries with their own troublesome histories of extremism, including Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, Egypt, Turkey, Morocco and Tunisia.

If Trump follows through on an order to suspend the admission of refugees, it would scramble the situations for some of the world's most desperate and vulnerable people. But, again, it would affect only a sliver of America's overall immigration total—the United States granted refugee status to 85,000 people in 2016. Syrians, whom the president would ban, made up 10,000 of that total. In other words, it's a symbolic and, refugee advocates argue, misguided crackdown on a small number of people that will do little to alter overall immigration flows or domestic security.

Just because a president signs executive orders, moreover, doesn't mean the commands will ultimately be carried out. As Engel points out, President Barack Obama ordered the closure of the Guantánamo Bay detention camp in Cuba on his second day in office. Eight years later, Gitmo is still up and running, although Obama did succeed in dramatically reducing the number of prisoners held there. Another Obama order, known as Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents (DAPA), halts deportations for certain classes of undocumented immigrants but has been held up by legal challenges. The same could happen to several of Trump's actions on immigration enforcement.

Other orders and memos Trump has issued in recent days are more simple to execute but have less of an impact. The president declared in a memo that the United States was withdrawing from the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP), a multilateral trade agreement with nations in the Asia-Pacific. But that agreement had not yet been ratified by Congress and was already presumed dead. Trump also reopened the approval process for the Keystone XL and Dakota Access pipelines, a blow to environmental activists. Analysts, however, largely agree that the pipelines have become outsized symbols for supporters and opponents alike and will not have a significant effect on either the environment or energy production in this country.

Trump is still considering an order to overturn the DAPA Obama order and another, Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA), which has allowed roughly 800,000 undocumented immigrants to stay in the United States. That action stands out as one that would take immediate effect and have a widespread impact. It would set an expiration date on the legal status of these longtime American residents, who were brought to the United States illegally as children, raising questions about whether they could be rounded up and deported.

The Trump White House has indicated that participants in DACA, known as DREAMers, will not be a deportation priority, but the uncertainty is sure to roil the entire community.

Overall, however, the scope of Trump's executive orders this week underscore the importance of symbolism, whether it's the pipelines, the TPP, a border wall, a federal hiring freeze or reinstating what's known as the Mexico City Policy: barring U.S. foreign aid to groups that advise on or offer abortions. "In terms of the day-to-day, how much these things affect the average Americans' lives, it's relatively small," says Engel. "In terms of how much it demonstrates symbolically that there is a new commander in chief and a new sheriff in town, it's huge."

University of Minnesota professor Larry Jacobs, for example, does not expect Trump's Cabinet secretaries to use his executive order on health care to undermine Obamacare, even though they could. “I don’t think that does anything except create problems for the Trump administration,” he explains. “They’ll be held responsible.”

Instead, Jacobs expects the health and human services secretary nominee, Tom Price, to focus most of his efforts on working with Congress to pass new health care legislation. And he predicts that process will be as long and politically fraught as the battle to pass Obamacare, formally known as the Affordable Care Act, in 2010. The order, he says, is little more than a signal to his political base “that he promised to repeal Obamacare right away and he’s off to the races.”

Trump’s orders are also intended to send a signal to the rest of the world, much the way Obama tried to do in 2009. In addition to his order to close Gitmo, Obama issued an order shortly after being sworn in outlawing the torture of foreign prisoners and nullifying related legal guidance issued under his predecessor, President George W. Bush. “It was framed not as an administrative decision but as a moral decision,” says Engel. “‘We are going to resurrect America’s good standing in the world.’”

Trump, on the other hand, is sending a very clear message with his orders on trade, immigration and border security: that the United States is “distinct and different from the rest of the world and not necessarily a partner for the rest of the world,” Engel says.

That could have weighty implications for American foreign policy and diplomacy. Obama’s efforts to expand refugee resettlement, for example, were as much about reassuring partners in Europe and the Middle East that the U.S. was willing to share more of the burden stemming from the global refugee crisis as it was a humanitarian gesture. Closing the door to refugees, even temporarily, sends the opposite signal.

Trump’s executive order to build a wall on the southern border, meanwhile, came the same day Mexico’s foreign minister arrived in the United States for meetings with the new administration. The timing, along with the White House’s insistence that Mexico will pay for the wall, is “very undiplomatic, a very big faux pas,” says Vanda Felbab-Brown, a senior fellow on foreign policy at the Brookings Institution, a D.C. think tank.

Felbab-Brown warns it could have major consequences for U.S.-Mexico relations. “In practice, a huge element of the border control is cooperation with Mexican border patrol,” she points out. She adds that could hurt Trump’s ability to wring significant concessions from Mexican President Enrique Peña-Nieto on the North American Free Trade Agreement, which he hopes to renegotiate.

Indeed, Peña-Nieto was scheduled to meet with Trump at the White House next week. But after Trump reiterated Thursday morning on Twitter that Mexico ought to pay for “the badly needed wall,” the Mexican government canceled the trip.

Trump’s Plan To Build A Bigger Border Wall Has Plenty Of Critics

Public Radio International, January 26, 2017

This week at a ceremony at the Department of Homeland Security, President Donald Trump signed an executive order to begin work to “build a large physical barrier on the southern border,” according to the White House.

The move is not especially welcome in Mexico, in part because Trump has vowed to make Mexico pay the cost of building the barrier. The timing, too, is interesting because it comes as Mexico’s foreign and economic ministers are meeting in Washington to prepare for Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto’s own visit to the capital next week.

“A lot of Mexicans here have the same questions [as] people do in the United States,” says The World’s Monica Campbell, who is based in Mexico City. “How do you force a country to cough up billions and billions of dollars for something that really is not in their interest? There is not really any support here in Mexico to build a bigger wall or a longer wall between the United States and Mexico.”

With key diplomatic meetings coming up in Washington, Campbell says many Mexicans and Mexican Americans are hoping the Mexican government officials will stand firm against Trump and have a more constructive conversation about “how our countries can work together instead of building this wall that polarizes us even more.”

So far Peña Nieto has said there will be “neither confrontation nor submission” when it comes to negotiating with Trump on trade and immigration.

But it will be a tricky negotiation, says Campbell. “Peña Nieto has to walk a fine line. At once, he has to stand firm and on the other hand there’s this idea of trying to start off on the right foot with the Trump administration.”

His political mission is made all the more difficult by Mexico’s own set of severe economic challenges including high inflation, rising gas prices and an overall lack of public confidence that the Mexican president can rise to the challenge and step up and defend Mexico’s interests in the face of the executive orders that Trump is advancing in his push to “make America great again.”

If the wall does get built, it will surely change a lot of lives in the Rio Grande Valley in Texas. Democrat Henry Cuellar represents that district in Congress. Cuellar says he agrees with the president’s impulse, but not his solution.

“I want to make sure we have a secure border, which means that we get more border patrol, more technology, camera sensors, to make sure that we secure the border,” he says. But at the same time, Cuellar is calling for a closer working relationship with “our Mexican friends.”

“We don’t want to have an open border, but I do know that if you put an emphasis on a 14th century solution called a ‘wall’ — we saw what happened with Imperial China and their wall, we know what happened with the Communists and their wall. It's not a very effective way of addressing the issues," Cuellar says.

In addition, he says, "over 40 percent of the people that we have in the US without documents came in through a legal permit or visa, so a wall is not going to stop them... We have to be careful on how we address this and not spend $6.5 million per mile for a fence as proposed, when we can do this with one mile of technology, each mile costing one million dollars by comparison."

Why Executive Order May Not Be Enough For Trump To Build Border Wall

By Serena Marshall , Ben Siegel

ABC News, January 26, 2017

One of President Trump's leading campaign promises was to build "a wall" along the southern border of the United States to stem the flow of undocumented immigrants, and he started the process Wednesday during a visit to the Department of Homeland Security.

Trump signed an executive order to, as press secretary Sean Spicer explained during a briefing Wednesday, begin the building of a "large physical barrier" along the U.S.-Mexican border.

Spicer re-emphasized that "yes, one way or another, as the president has said before, Mexico will pay for it," though offering no specifics on how it would be funded in the meantime.

For his part, Trump said in remarks at DHS Wednesday, "We are going to save lives on both sides of the border, and we also understand that a strong and healthy economy in Mexico is very good for the United States."

The president also told ABC News Wednesday in his first one-on-one television interview since being sworn in that U.S. taxpayer dollars would be used to start the construction of the wall after negotiations between the United States and Mexico begin "relatively soon."

But still at issue is whether Trump's executive authority is enough to move the proposed project forward. Here are some key questions to consider:

Can He Get It Done?

One of the first questions to ponder is whether he can legally build a wall? Yes, though most likely only if he can get Congress to pay for it.

But Trump has decided to begin the process on his own, signing two executive orders Wednesday that would increase the number of border patrol enforcement officers and lay the groundwork for building his proposed wall along unspecified portions of the 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

To that end, the Trump administration and GOP leaders are invoking a 2006 law – the Secure Fence Act – that authorized about 700 miles of fencing along the southern border. The goal of that law, with support from Democrats like then-Sen. Hillary Clinton and Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, was to keep pedestrians and vehicles from crossing.

Then-President George W. Bush signed the measure after Congress approved it, and various kinds of fencing have since been constructed in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

Why Does He Need Congress?

President Trump has ordered the Department of Homeland Security to review its $41 billion annual budget and move funds within the organization to help fund the border wall effort. The House and Senate appropriations committees would have to approve any reallocation of funding internally.

"The department [of Homeland Security] can move money around to some degree; small amounts within individual agencies have reprogramming limits set in place by specific reappropriation committees," Kenneth Gold, director of the Government Affairs Institute at Georgetown University, said.

But because the wall is expected to cost billions of dollars, it's more than likely that the White House will need additional money, which means the administration will have to ask Congress for it.

"The whole purpose of the appropriations clause of the Constitution is to place limits on what the president can do on his own," Gold said. "Presidents cannot simply decide to obligate funds that Congress has not appropriated money for."

House Speaker Paul Ryan, R-Wis., today said Congress will approve funding for the wall in a supplemental appropriations bill, which he and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky estimate will cost between $12 to $15 billion.

"We intend to address the wall issue ourselves and the president can deal with his relations with other countries on that issue and others," McConnell told reporters today at the GOP policy retreat in Philadelphia.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., in response to Trump's orders, Wednesday said in a statement, "With today's sweeping and constitutionally suspect executive actions, the president is turning his back on both our history and our values as a proud nation of immigrants," and "wasting billions of taxpayer dollars on a border wall Mexico will never pay for."

How Would He Pay for It?

Trump said he envisions U.S. taxpayers' paying upfront, and then being reimbursed by Mexico for the wall, which he has estimated could cost from $8 billion to $ 12 billon.

Whatever the cost, he told ABC News' David Muir Wednesday, "We will be reimbursed at a later date from whatever transaction we make, from Mexico,"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Mexican officials, who canceled an upcoming scheduled meeting with Trump in protest, have repeatedly said they will not pay.

"I regret and reject the decision of the United States to continue building a wall that, that for years, far from uniting us, divides us," Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto said in a taped message Wednesday. "Mexico does not believe in walls."

Trump said today that he and Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto "agreed" to cancel their planned meeting in the United States next week.

For comparison, the portion of the 700 miles of fencing built in 2007, under the Secure Fence Act of 2006 signed by President Bush, was estimated to cost about $2.8 million a mile, according to the Congressional Research Service in a 2009 report to Congress.

It was also constructed using mostly the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the National Guard. The report also found "fencing constructed in FY2008, using mostly private constructors, cost about $5.1 million a mile."

According to an analysis published in the MIT Technology Review, building a new 1,000-mile wall could cost as much as $40 billion. Their breakdown includes the current price of steel and concrete.

Trump has said he doesn't need a wall to extend the entire length of the 2,000-mile border. "We need 1,000 because we have natural barriers … and I'm taking it price per square foot and a price per square, you know, per mile," he told MSNBC last February.

But there are also costs associated with maintenance and upkeep.

"The Corps of Engineers also predicted that the 25-year, life-cycle cost of the fence [authorized in 2006] would range from $16.4 million to $70 million per mile depending on the amount of damage sustained by the fencing," according to the 2009 Congressional Research Service report

This means that without Congress' involvement, Trump likely wouldn't have the funds not only to build the wall, but maintain it for years to come.

Would a Wall Even Work?

There are about 700 miles of U.S.-Mexico border fencing, officials note.

And Border Patrol already employs a "digital wall" with roughly 8,000 cameras monitoring the southern fence, ports of entry and watching above from helium balloons.

It also has resources that include more than 11,000 underground sensors, 107 aircraft, eight drones, 175 mobile surveillance units and 84 boats, allowing them, in Customs and Border Protection's words, to monitor the border closer and more effectively.

"We can spend billions of dollars, to build a 10-foot wall on top of a 10,000-foot mountain," former DHS Secretary Jeh Johnson said in a November speech, "but if you've come all the way from Central America, it's not going to stop you."

Trump's Border Wall Faces Reality Check

By ANDREW TAYLOR, ALICIA CALDWELL

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Donald Trump's vow to accelerate construction of a "contiguous, physical wall" along the Mexican border is slamming into a Washington reality – who's going to pay for it and how?

Not us, say the Mexicans.

Instead, U.S. taxpayers will foot the bill, starting with money already in the Department of Homeland Security account that amounts to a small down payment. Then it's up to the Republican-led Congress to come up with $12 billion to $15 billion more, according to an estimate offered by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., on Thursday from a GOP issues retreat in Philadelphia.

GOP leaders refused to commit to paying for the wall with spending cuts elsewhere in the budget. That could mean costs would be paid for by adding to the government's $20 trillion debt. Press Secretary Sean Spicer Thursday floated the idea of a 20 percent tariff on Mexican imports.

On Wednesday, Trump promised "immediate construction" would begin on the border wall, telling ABC News that planning is starting immediately. He again vowed that Mexico would pay the U.S. back, though he offered no details.

It is true there is a small amount available now in the Department of Homeland Security accounts dedicated to "border security fencing, infrastructure, and technology" – $100 million, by one congressional estimate – that would permit work to get immediately under way.

So far, thanks to spending in the late 2000s, Congress has provided about $2.3 billion to construct 654 miles of fencing and vehicular blockades. But Trump has promised a wall, not just fencing, and it's not a universally popular idea by any stretch.

"The facts have not changed. Building a wall is the most expensive and least effective way to secure the border," said GOP Rep. Will Hurd, whose sprawling West Texas swing district encompasses more than 800 miles of the border. "Many areas in my district are perfect examples of where a wall is unnecessary and would negatively impact the environment, private property rights and economy."

GOP members of the appropriations committees are more likely to take a green eyeshade approach to the money since they are familiar with the likely trade-offs.

"There's any number of complications," said Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., former House Appropriations Committee Chairman, citing obstacles such as Indian reservations and national parks and forests. And much of the remaining 1,300 miles is very rough terrain, with steep construction costs and a limited return for the dollar. "It's expensive and it's complicated."

Hundreds of miles of the border are so rugged and inhospitable that it doesn't make sense to even try to build.

And in Texas, almost all of the land along the border is privately owned. When former President George W. Bush tried to build border fencing starting in 2006, he faced stiff opposition from local ranchers and farmers, many of whom took the government to court on plans to use their land.

In many areas along the Rio Grande the fencing is built well inside the United States, as far as a mile north of the Rio Grande, to ensure that the structure doesn't interfere with the flow of the river or is built on solid ground. The middle of the channel marks the internal border and a 1970 treaty with Mexico requires that structures built there not interfere with water flow.

"We have built a fence along the border almost as much as we possibly can without violating tribal laws, environmental requirements, and taking over peoples' personal, private property," said Michelle Mrdeza, who worked for the House Appropriations panel during the fence debate of the mid-2000s.

The existing blockade – roughly 350 miles to block pedestrians and 300 miles to block vehicles – has already been built along the southern border. That fencing was built in the areas that are most vulnerable to illegal crossings.

"Insofar as the problem is a physical barrier, we've basically addressed that issue," said Rep. David Price, D-N.C., who chaired the congressional panel that funded the border fence when Democrats controlled Congress. "This focus, this fixation on a wall and pouring untold billions of dollars into a wall, is foolishness."

Cost estimates prepared a decade ago already varied widely. A 2009 Government Accountability Office analysis put costs at $6.5 million a mile for pedestrian fencing and $1.8 million per mile for vehicular blockades. An actual wall constructed of concrete and steel would be more costly and difficult.

Trump has repeatedly promised that Mexico will pay for his wall, though neither he nor his allies in Congress are able to articulate how. The president of Mexico is emphatic that his country will not pick up the tab.

"I regret and reject the decision of the U.S. to build the wall," Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto said Wednesday in a nationally televised address in his country. "I have said time and again, Mexico will not pay for any wall."

Already, U.S. agencies have been told to scrub their budgets for savings that could be used for the wall.

"These taxpayer dollars would be better spent on investing ... to find cures for cancer and other diseases, spending on hospitals and doctors to care for our veterans, helping communities with clean water investments, supporting police in our communities," said Sen. Pat Leahy, D-Vt.

Congress Scrambles To Make Sense Of Trump Plan To Tax Mexico To Pay For Border Wall

By Kelsey Snell

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

Lawmakers in Congress scrambled Thursday to try to make sense of news that President Donald Trump wants to use a 20 percent tax on goods imported from Mexico to pay for the cost of constructing wall on the Southern border.

"We're working on a tax reform bill that will reduce our trade deficits, increase American exports and will generate revenue from Mexico that will pay for the wall if we decide to go that route," Trump announced at a GOP policy retreat in Philadelphia.

Cheers immediately rang out from House Republicans because it seemed like Trump was referring to their idea to tax all imports at a rate of 20 percent and exempt exports from tax entirely. Trump seemed to dismiss that same plan, known as "border adjustment," earlier this month when he told the Wall Street Journal that the idea was "too complicated."

Such a stunning change in tax policy would need buy-in from a wide range of lawmakers on the Capitol Hill, most of whom spent Thursday just trying to figure out what exactly Trump wants the tax policy to include.

House Republican leaders and their staff rushed to say that it was clear Trump was embracing their entire border adjustment idea.

"We have been and continue to be on the same page about tax reform that supports American jobs and American goods," said AshLee Strong, a spokeswoman for House Speaker Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis).

Members of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee insisted Trump was on their side.

"What he's referring to is border adjustment,"said Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.), a senior member on Ways and Means.

Then things got complicated. White House spokesman Sean Spicer told reporters traveling back to Washington from Philadelphia that Trump supports using the tax to raise around $10 billion per year to offset the cost of building a wall with Mexico. He didn't mention the rest of the border adjustment plan.

"When you look at the plan that's taking shape now, using comprehensive tax reform as a means to tax imports from countries that we have a trade deficit from, like Mexico," Spicer said.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

That all changed later when Spicer said the idea was just one of many options on the table.

"The idea is to show that generating revenue for the wall is not as difficult as some might have suggested," Spicer later told reporters. "The idea today wasn't rolling it out or being prescriptive or announce anything, it's to say hey look, it's not that hard to do."

Several GOP aides said they were confused because Trump's statement was so vague. Most declined to comment on the proposal because they simply didn't know if Trump was advocating for a tariff on goods from Mexico or if he supports the House GOP idea.

The system of taxing all imports is often confused with a tariff because both systems effectively drive up the price of imports. The difference is in how the two ideas are executed. A tariff is a punitive fee on specific imports and a border tax is a tax exclusion for exports. Republicans say their idea acts as an incentive for companies to buy U.S.-made goods.

Critics argue that either way, consumers are the ones who ultimately pay the price when stores like Walmart that sell millions of imported goods increase prices to make up for the new higher taxes.

Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), who chairs the Freedom Caucus, a group of a conservative House members, didn't endorse the idea when asked about it — but didn't fully reject it either.

"We have to explore a number of options on how to pay for that. You know, generally speaking, I'm against tariffs," said Meadows. "You know, I look at it from an economic standpoint. At the same time, I don't want to hamstring the administration in things they are willing to explore."

Analysis: Trump's Border Wall Faces Reality Check

By Andrew Taylor And Alicia Caldwell

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Donald Trump's vow to accelerate construction of a "contiguous, physical wall" along the Mexican border is slamming into a Washington reality – who's going to pay for it and how?

Not us, say the Mexicans.

Instead, U.S. taxpayers will foot the bill, starting with money already in the Department of Homeland Security account that amounts to a small down payment. Then it's up to the Republican-led Congress to come up with $12 billion to $15 billion more, according to an estimate offered by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., on Thursday from a GOP issues retreat in Philadelphia.

GOP leaders refused to commit to paying for the wall with spending cuts elsewhere in the budget. That could mean costs would be paid for by adding to the government's $20 trillion debt. Press Secretary Sean Spicer Thursday floated the idea of a 20 percent tariff on Mexican imports.

On Wednesday, Trump promised "immediate construction" would begin on the border wall, telling ABC News that planning is starting immediately. He again vowed that Mexico would pay the U.S. back, though he offered no details.

It is true there is a small amount available now in the Department of Homeland Security accounts dedicated to "border security fencing, infrastructure, and technology" – $100 million, by one congressional estimate – that would permit work to get immediately under way.

So far, thanks to spending in the late 2000s, Congress has provided about $2.3 billion to construct 654 miles of fencing and vehicular blockades. But Trump has promised a wall, not just fencing, and it's not a universally popular idea by any stretch.

"The facts have not changed. Building a wall is the most expensive and least effective way to secure the border," said GOP Rep. Will Hurd, whose sprawling West Texas swing district encompasses more than 800 miles of the border. "Many areas in my district are perfect examples of where a wall is unnecessary and would negatively impact the environment, private property rights and economy."

GOP members of the appropriations committees are more likely to take a green eyeshade approach to the money since they are familiar with the likely trade-offs.

"There's any number of complications," said Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., former House Appropriations Committee Chairman, citing obstacles such as Indian reservations and national parks and forests. And much of the remaining 1,300 miles is very rough terrain, with steep construction costs and a limited return for the dollar. "It's expensive and it's complicated."

Hundreds of miles of the border are so rugged and inhospitable that it doesn't make sense to even try to build.

And in Texas, almost all of the land along the border is privately owned. When former President George W. Bush tried to build border fencing starting in 2006, he faced stiff opposition from local ranchers and farmers, many of whom took the government to court on plans to use their land.

In many areas along the Rio Grande the fencing is built well inside the United States, as far as a mile north of the Rio Grande, to ensure that the structure doesn't interfere with the flow of the river or is built on solid ground. The middle of the channel marks the internal border and a 1970 treaty with Mexico requires that structures built there not interfere with water flow.

"We have built a fence along the border almost as much as we possibly can without violating tribal laws, environmental requirements, and taking over peoples' personal, private property," said Michelle Mrdeza, who worked for the House Appropriations panel during the fence debate of the mid-2000s.

The existing blockade – roughly 350 miles to block pedestrians and 300 miles to block vehicles – has already been built along the southern border. That fencing was built in the areas that are most vulnerable to illegal crossings.

"Insofar as the problem is a physical barrier, we've basically addressed that issue," said Rep. David Price, D-N.C., who chaired the congressional panel that funded the border fence when Democrats controlled Congress. "This focus, this fixation on a wall and pouring untold billions of dollars into a wall, is foolishness."

Cost estimates prepared a decade ago already varied widely. A 2009 Government Accountability Office analysis put costs at $6.5 million a mile for pedestrian fencing and $1.8 million per mile for vehicular blockades. An actual wall constructed of concrete and steel would be more costly and difficult.

Trump has repeatedly promised that Mexico will pay for his wall, though neither he nor his allies in Congress are able to articulate how. The president of Mexico is emphatic that his country will not pick up the tab.

"I regret and reject the decision of the U.S. to build the wall," Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto said Wednesday in a nationally televised address in his country. "I have said time and again, Mexico will not pay for any wall."

Already, U.S. agencies have been told to scrub their budgets for savings that could be used for the wall.

"These taxpayer dollars would be better spent on investing ... to find cures for cancer and other diseases, spending on hospitals and doctors to care for our veterans, helping communities with clean water investments, supporting police in our communities," said Sen. Pat Leahy, D-Vt.

Trump's Wall Met With Skepticism, Unease On US-Mexico Border

By Elliot Spagat And Julie Watson

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

SAN DIEGO (AP) – As President Donald Trump announced his plans for a wall on the U.S. border with Mexico, Border Patrol agents in San Diego on the lookout for drugs and smugglers drove all-terrain vehicles along a barrier that reaches 18 feet, topped by razor wire and reinforced by cameras and lighting.

Mexicans shopped at an outlet mall that bumps up against the border. And dozens of migrants huddled in tents outside a shelter in Mexico hoping to get into the U.S. someday.

To them, Trump's executive order Wednesday to build a wall seemed more like a symbolic and worrisome gesture of a new chapter in U.S-Mexico relations than a real deterrent for people to enter the country illegally.

"Even if they build the wall, I will climb the wall. I bring a ladder the size of the wall, even from sticks or whatever, but I'll make it, and I'll jump over there," said Jos de Jes s Ram rez, a recently deported Mexican migrant whose wife and children are in the U.S.

Ramirez's response echoed the mood along the border that was a combination of resentment, defiance – and business as usual. A crew of laborers was actually building a fence on the border as Trump made his announcement. On a cold morning in the desert, the workers installed concrete blocks on which the 22-foot steel fence will stand between the town of Sunland Park, New Mexico, and Ciudad Juarez in Mexico. The project has been underway for several months.

In Tijuana, a high school student went to a stone monument dedicated by both countries in 1848 as a sign of the friendship between the U.S. and Mexico. The monument once stood on the border but now is in Mexico, a few feet away from a giant wall of towering steel bars that lead into the Pacific Ocean.

The student, 17-year-old Brandon Dzul, said talk of another wall stirred up painful memories of his 34-year-old uncle who died in the desert six years ago after being abandoned by smugglers.

"He just had the American dream, you know, to make a better life," he said. "I think now we aren't going to be able to get in even with a visa."

Nearby, about 150 people gathered in tents outside a 40-bed migrant shelter that has been overwhelmed since May, when large numbers of Haitians began stopping in the Mexican border city on their way to the United States. Many moved to Brazil after Haiti's 2010 earthquake and went north after jobs dried up in the South American country.

Haitians generally turn themselves in to U.S. inspectors at San Diego's San Ysidro port of entry, the nation's busiest crossing, making no attempt to jump the fence or evade authorities. They were released on humanitarian parole until September, when the U.S. ended special treatment for Haitians and began deporting them just as they do people from other countries.

U.S. authorities lack resources to process Haitians quickly enough, leading Mexican authorities to create a ticketing system that leaves them waiting in Tijuana for weeks. Migrant shelters are full, forcing many to sleep on the streets.

Fences and other barriers already blanket about 700 miles of border, much of it in California and Arizona. In San Diego, they helped to virtually shut down what was the busiest corridor for illegal crossings in the 1990s. It's now one of the most fortified stretches of landscape on the 2,000-mile divide between the two countries.

Border Patrol sector chiefs were asked in November to identify areas where the fence could be expanded, though Trump and his advisers have yet to detail their next steps. Brandon Judd, president of the National Border Patrol Council and a member of Trump's transition team, supports building a wall in strategic locations and reinforcing existing barriers in certain areas but not where there are natural obstacles, like the Rio Grande river in Texas.

"We do not need a Great Wall of China from California to Texas," Judd said in an interview last week.

Away from the border, Trump drew support from his base. Tammy Allen, a 52-year-old supporter who splits time between Florida and Virginia, applauded Trump's interest in curbing the number of refugees coming to the U.S. and building a wall.

"A lot of countries do. Why not us? Something has got to be done," she said.

Associated Press writer Michael Kunzelman in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

This story has been corrected to show that Trump supporter Tammy Allen splits time between Florida and Virginia and isn't from Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Conway On Border: It's Time We Spent Money 'Protecting Our Own'

By Louis Nelson

Politico, January 26, 2017

Despite repeated promises to the contrary from Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto, counselor to the president Kellyanne Conway said Thursday morning that Mexico will foot the bill for her boss's promised border wall.

But Conway, appearing on NBC's "Today" also said that it is "high time" that the U.S. spend money protecting its own border.

"President Trump has been very clear and consistent on this point, Matt. He's going to build the wall, Mexico will pay for it. Whether they pay for it straight-out, or it's reimbursed later on after congressional funding," Conway told NBC host Matt Lauer. "It's about being a sovereign nation. The United States of America spends billions of dollars protecting other countries' borders. It's high time we spend some money protecting our own."

Conway's comments came one day after President Donald Trump signed a pair of executive orders aimed at fulfilling the hardline promises he made on immigration during the campaign. Included in those orders was a provision to initiate the construction of a "physical barrier" along America's southern border with Mexico, as well as increased resources for border enforcement and directions to strip federal funding from so-called "sanctuary" states and cities that harbor undocumented immigrants.

Throughout the campaign, Trump promised that Mexico would pay for the wall but since winning last year's presidential election, he has begun saying that U.S. taxpayers would fund the project for the sake of expediency and then be paid back by Mexico. In an interview that aired Wednesday evening, Trump told ABC News anchor David Muir that payment from Mexico "will be in a form, perhaps a complicated form."

Conway declined to elaborate during her "Today" show appearance what "complicated" form the payment from Mexico might take, telling Lauer that she understood what Trump was referring to but would not clarify because the president "wants to give the deference to his meeting with the Mexican president and other Mexican officials before he announces that."

"I mean, welcome to Washington," she said. "It's hardly breaking news to talk about the complication of funding new projects. And that's what this is."

10 Huge Flaws In Trump's Immigration Directives

By Jennifer Rubin

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

One hardly knows where to begin in describing the flaws in the batch of immigration actions President Trump announced on Wednesday. Here are 10 for starters:

1. This is more hysteria unrelated to actual border conditions. As the Wall Street Journal editorial board put it, "Border apprehensions were 192,000 last year, but that's down from 981,000 a decade ago. Pew estimates that about 11.1 million unauthorized immigrants live in the U.S. (3.5% of the population), and 52% are Mexicans. That share is falling every year amid rising illegal entries from Asia, Central America and sub-Saharan Africa. Most of these aliens arrive legally but overstay their visas." This is an expensive, counterproductive agenda in search of a problem.

2. The terrain of much of the border is not conducive to fencing.

3. Trump's obsession with the southern border and relative indifference to visa overstays suggests a bias against certain illegal immigrants. Trump thinks Mexican immigrants are "killers" and "criminals," while apparently never having used such invective against other illegal immigrant groups.

4. A physical wall is duplicative, ineffective and unnecessary. Cato Institute scholar David Bier explains that we have more than 600 miles of border fencing already. Moreover, "Tunnels are typically used more for drug smuggling, but they are still a serious vulnerability in any kind of physical barrier." Walls can be defeated by ladders and ramps. Zero evidence exists that a wall is a cost-effective means of stemming illegal entry. ("Despite the importance of this question, apparently no estimate of the impact of the current border fence on illegal immigration exists at all, let alone a comparison to other technologies. This is despite more than a decade to conduct such a study for the recent fences, and even longer to study the earlier fences.")

5. This is a boondoggle of the worst sort. "For the full 1,000 miles, Trump's 30-foot wall (with a 10-foot tunnel barrier) would cost $31.2 billion, according to the best estimate from Massachusetts Institute of Technology engineers—that is $31.2 million per mile," as Bier notes.

6. Building a wall will be a huge expansion of federal power and land, reinforcing Republicans' long-standing complaints that the feds gobble up too much state land.

7. Trump actually is making apprehension and deportation of criminals harder. The Obama administration already prioritized deportation of violent criminals. An immigration lawyer explained to me that contrary to the Obama administration, the Trump order "prioritizes nearly everything." He points out, "Labeling every person a 'priority' is like highlighting every word in a textbook." Since resources are finite, Trump increases the chances that a truly violent criminal won't be deported. When those people commit new crimes, Trump's scattershot policy will be partly to blame.

8. There is no way Mexico is going to pay for the wall. Trump's statement that U.S. taxpayers wouldn't pay the cost has morphed into a word salad. "Ultimately, it will come out of what's happening with Mexico," Trump told ABC's David Muir. "We're going to be starting those negotiations relatively soon, and we will be in a form reimbursed by Mexico." We have no idea what this means.

9. The notion of a "sanctuary city" is a misnomer. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents are free to apprehend individuals wherever they want. We are talking about the extent to which local law enforcement can be required to devote resources (e.g. hold illegal immigrants in jails) and whether, for example, it demands a warrant from the feds. Who is going to monitor and decide whether the cities are living up to the requirements? What if the federal government and cities disagree on whether the local authorities are being sufficiently cooperative?

10. If the federal government cuts off aid to cities, shortfalls in everything from schools to roads to anti-poverty programs to health care (what about Medicaid costs for people in those cities?) will be attributable to Trump's policy. When people "die on the streets" or shootings increase in a city, there will be a convenient person to blame: Trump.

There are dozens of other reasons not to pursue these policies, including the damage it will do to relations with Mexico. Whatever you think about illegal immigration, Trump's approach — like much of what he does — makes for good PR with his base but is rotten policy for the United States.

Mexican President Cancels Planned DC Meeting With Trump

By Mark Stevenson

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

MEXICO CITY (AP) – Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto canceled a planned Tuesday meeting with President Donald J. Trump on Thursday, signaling a remarkable souring of relations between Washington and one of its most important international partners just days into the new administration.

The rift capped days of increasingly confrontational remarks – on Twitter and in dueling public appearances – between the two men, whose countries conduct some $1.6 billion a day in cross-border trade, and cooperate on everything from migration to anti-drug enforcement to environmental issues.

Hours after Trump tweeted that the meeting should be scrapped if Mexico doesn't agree to pay for a wall along the nearly 2,000-mile border, Pena Nieto responded via the same platform.

"This morning we have informed the White House I will not attend the working meeting planned for next Tuesday," the Mexican president tweeted. He added that "Mexico reaffirms its willingness to work with the United States to reach agreements that benefit both nations."

In a speech later Thursday, Trump doubled down on the dispute, saying that "unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless, and I want to go a different route. We have no choice."

Trump also claimed that calling off the meeting was a mutual decision and floated a new possible threat to Mexico, which sends about 80 percent of its exports to the U.S. and which has vowed not to pay for a wall.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000413

"We're working on a tax reform bill that will reduce our trade deficit, increase American exports and will generate revenue from Mexico that will pay for the wall, if we decide to go that route," Trump said.

His spokesman later said Trump was calling for a 20 percent tax on imports to pay for the southern wall.

He has also pledged to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico and Canada.

"I will not allow the citizens or the taxpayers of the United States to pay the cost of this defective transaction, NAFTA, one that should have been renegotiated many years ago, except that the politicians were too preoccupied to do so," Trump said.

Mexican officials have expressed willingness to update the pact, but said they would consider walking away from NAFTA if negotiations mean making too many concessions.

Mexico is one of America's biggest trade partners, and the U.S. is the No. 1 buyer from Mexico, accounting for about 80 percent of Mexican exports. A complete rupture in ties could be damaging to the U.S. economy, an disastrous for Mexico's

"Today's events are dangerous for the immediate and long-term security and economy of the United States," Jason Marczak of the Atlantic Council wrote. "U.S.-Mexico cooperation is far-reaching: from intelligence sharing for the capture of drug traffickers to the flow of commercial goods that support the livelihoods of nearly 5 million American workers."

White House press secretary Sean Spicer later responded to the Mexican president's tweet, saying: "We'll look for a date to schedule something in the future. We will keep the lines of communication open."

Pena Nieto's decision ended days of uncertainty about how he would respond to Trump's aggressive stance toward the country, and illustrated the challenges world leaders are likely to face in dealing with the U.S. president's voluble, Twitter-based diplomacy.

The diplomatic row also recalls the rocky days of U.S.-Mexico relations in the 1980s, prior to NAFTA.

"There is a change in the understanding that had been in operation over the last 22 years, when Mexico was considered a strategic ally," said Isidro Morales, a political scientist at the Monterrey Institute of Technology and Higher Education. "Trump has unilaterally broken with this way of doing things."

Mexico had tried its traditional approach of quiet, cautious diplomacy combined with back-room discussions, sending Cabinet officials for talks with the Trump administration. But that changed when Trump decided to announce his border wall on the same day that two senior Mexican Cabinet ministers – Foreign Relations Secretary Luis Videgaray and Economy Secretary Ildefonso Guajardo – arrived in Washington for preliminary talks ahead of what was to be a presidential tete-a-tete. Many were affronted by the timing, and Pena Nieto faced a firestorm of criticism at home.

That evening Pena Nieto issued recorded remarks suggesting he was reconsidering his upcoming trip to Washington. On Thursday morning, Trump tweeted: "If Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel."

The president had "no other choice but to say 'I'm not going,'" former foreign relations secretary Jorge Castaneda told Mexican media.

Already deeply unpopular at home with historic-low approval ratings, Pena Nieto had come under increasing pressure to stand up to Trump.

Mexico's best-known opposition politician, leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, tweeted that "in the face of Trump's latest outburst, don't go to the meeting, and submit an urgent complaint to the U.N. for human rights violations."

Many Mexicans said Thursday that they backed Pena Nieto's decision to scrap the trip.

Magda Hoffmann, a Mexico City retiree, called Trump's behavior "insulting and rude."

"As my grandmother said," she added, "'Don't go where you're not invited.'"

Like many, she found the conduct of diplomacy-by-tweets to be odd.

"This is a diplomatic relationship here. I'm sorry, gentlemen, but that has to be given value," Hoffman said. "It's not a question to be handled ... text-messaging back and forth."

Orlando Contreras, a 35-year-old computer engineer in the capital, said he believed Pena Nieto had no reason to "negotiate under their conditions."

"I feel that we have always been under their (the U.S.) yoke," Contreras said. "I think it would be a good thing to separate ourselves from them, so Mexico can strike out on its own."

Mexico's President Cancels Meeting With Trump Over Wall

By Azam Ahmed

New York Times, January 26, 2017

MEXICO CITY — President Donald J. Trump's decision to build a wall along the southern border escalated into a diplomatic standoff on Thursday, with Mexico's president publicly canceling a scheduled meeting at the White House and Mr. Trump firing back, accusing Mexico of burdening the United States with illegal immigrants, criminals and a trade deficit.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Mr. Trump's push to fulfill his campaign pledge and build a border wall brought to a head months of simmering tensions, culminating in a remarkable back-and-forth between the two leaders.

By afternoon, Mr. Trump's spokesman said the president would pay for the border wall by imposing a 20 percent tax on imports to the United States, which he said would raise billions of dollars.

The sparring began Thursday morning when the president of Mexico announced on Twitter that he was canceling his meeting with Mr. Trump next week, rejecting the visit after the new American leader ordered the border wall between the two nations.

Having called for dialogue in the face of Mr. Trump's vows to build a wall during the American presidential campaign, Mr. Peña Nieto ultimately bowed to public pressure in Mexico to respond more forcefully to his northern neighbor.

On Wednesday, Mr. Trump signed an executive order to beef up the nation's deportation force and start construction on a new wall along the border. Adding to the perceived insult was the timing of the order: It came on the first day of talks between top Mexican officials and their counterparts in Washington, and just days before the meeting between the two presidents.

Mr. Trump's action was enough to prompt Mr. Peña Nieto to start discussing whether to scrap his plans to visit the White House, according to Mexican officials. In a video message delivered over Twitter on Wednesday night, Mr. Peña Nieto reiterated his commitment to protect the interests of Mexico and the Mexican people, and he chided the move in Washington to continue with the wall.

"I regret and condemn the United States' decision to continue with the construction of a wall that, for years now, far from uniting us, divides us," he said.

Then on Thursday morning, Mr. Trump fired back, warning that he might cancel the meeting himself if Mexico did not agree to pay for the wall.

Just before Mr. Trump fired off his Twitter post, the Mexican foreign minister and Mr. Trump's Homeland Security secretary, John F. Kelly, were preparing to see each other for a scheduled 11:30 a.m. meeting.

According to a senior American official, the secretary had been briefed. The appropriate flags had been arranged by the protocol staff at the Department of Homeland Security. Then, just as American officials greeted the minister outside the department's headquarters in Northwest Washington, the minister received word from Mexico that he was being pulled back, the official said. The meeting never happened.

By early afternoon, Mr. Trump said it was the United States that was being treated unfairly.

"We have agreed to cancel our planned meeting," Mr. Trump said in a new conference Thursday afternoon. "Unless Mexico is going to treat the U.S. fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless, and I want to go a different route. We have no choice."

In Mexico, Mr. Peña Nieto had little political room to maneuver. With Mr. Trump's order to build the wall, the perceived insults Mexico had endured during the campaign had finally turned into action. Decades of friendly relations between the nations — on matters involving trade, security and migration — seemed to be unraveling.

Calls began to come in from across the political spectrum for Mr. Peña Nieto to cancel his visit, and to respond with greater fortitude to the perceived menace from President Trump. On Twitter, Mr. Trump's action was referred to by politicians and historians as a "an offense to Mexico," a "slap in the face" and a "monument to lies."

Historians said that not since President Calvin Coolidge threatened to invade a "Soviet Mexico" had the United States so deeply antagonized the Mexican populace.

"It is an unprecedented moment for the bilateral relationship," said Genaro Lozano, a professor at the Iberoamerican University in Mexico City. "In the 19th century, we fought a war with the U.S.; now we find ourselves in a low-intensity war, a commercial one over Nafta and an immigration war due to the measures he just announced."

Not So Fast Nieto: Trump Says Cancelled Meet With Mexico President Was Mutual Decision

By S.A. Miller

Washington Times, January 26, 2017

PHILADELPHIA — President Trump said Thursday that he and Mexican President Enrique Pena Nieto mutually agreed to call off their meeting scheduled for next week in Washington, making the claim within hours of Mr. Nieto announcing that he wasn't coming.

The meeting derailed over Mr. Trump signing orders Wednesday to begin building a Wall on the U.S.-Mexico border and his insisting that Mexico would pay for it, which Mexican official took as an insult.

"Have agreed to cancel our planned meeting scheduled for next week," Mr. Trump told House and Senate Republicans at a strategy retreat in Philadelphia. "Such a meeting would be fruitless."

"There will be a wall," said Mr. Trump

Mr. Trump said that Americans needed a president who would stand up for them the say presidents in other countries stand up for their citizens.

"The world has taken advantage of us for many years. It's not going to happen anymore," said Mr. Trump.

Under pressure from Mexican lawmakers to back out of the meeting, Mr. Nieto said that he remains firm in his refusal to pay for the wall.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Early Thursday morning Mr. Trump said that if Mexico was unwilling to talk about paying for the wall, then Mr. Pena Nieto should follow through on his threat to cancel the meeting.

Mr. Nieto later said on Twitter that the meeting was off.

Brushing aside the run-in with Mr. Nieto, the president said that he also planned to make good on his promise to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement, which he has labeled a "bad deal" that shipped U.S. manufacturing jobs south of the border.

"I made clear to the government of Mexico that NAFTA has been a terrible deal, a total disaster for the United States from the inception," he said. "It's costing us as much as $60 billion a year from Mexico alone in a trade deficit."

"You say, 'Who negotiates these deals,'" he asked.

He said that Americans have known for years that NAFTA was a bad deal that needed to be renegotiated "except the politicians were too preoccupied to do so." He then said that didn't apply to the politicians gathered in the room.

"Unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless and I want to go a different route. We have no choice," said Mr. Trump.

Trump Says Meeting With Mexican President Would Have Been 'Fruitless'

By Michael A. Memoli

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump cast the cancellation of a meeting with Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto as a mutual decision Thursday, saying the summit would have been "fruitless" unless Mexico demonstrated it would "treat the United States fairly" and "with respect."

The scheduled summit had been billed as a chance for Trump and Peña Nieto to start discussions on the North American Free Trade Agreement and immigration, both Trump priorities. But it was Trump's continued insistence that Mexico reimburse the U.S. for construction of a new border wall that prompted Peña Nieto to skip the visit.

Trump said that he and Peña Nieto had agreed to cancel the meeting, but Peña Nieto tweeted that Mexican officials had informed the White House that he would not be attending.

"Unless Mexico is going to treat the United States fairly, with respect, such a meeting would be fruitless," Trump said. "And I want to go a different route."

Speaking in Philadelphia to congressional Republicans, Trump called border security a "serious, serious national issue."

"The American people will not pay for the wall," he said. "It is time that the American people had a president fighting as hard for its citizens as other countries do for theirs. And that is exactly what I'm going to do for you."

Trump said he also wouldn't allow taxpayers to lose money because of the "defective transaction" that NAFTA represented.

Without Mexico's agreement to pay for construction of the wall, Trump signaled one possible way to generate revenue without its cooperation: tax legislation that would reduce the trade deficit and increase American exports.

That would be part of a larger legislative agenda that Trump said could make this Republican-led Congress the busiest in decades, or "maybe ever." After summarizing executive actions he's taken already, Trump pointed to other priorities he would seek to move through Congress, starting with the repeal of the Affordable Care Act.

He also called for a major infrastructure plan that would focus on fixing existing roads, bridges and airports before building new ones.

And he telegraphed action he was expected to take later Thursday, ordering an investigation into allegations of voter fraud that he has called a major issue, despite studies showing otherwise.

"We are going to protect the integrity of the ballot box. and we are going to defend the votes of the American citizens," he said.

Trump, an unconventional Republican, urged his party to embrace its heritage as "the party of American industry and the American worker."

"Think of everything we can achieve. And remember who we must achieve it for," he said. "We're here now because tens of millions of Americans have placed their hopes in us to transfer power from Washington, D.C., and give it back to the people. Now we have to deliver."

Trump Lays Groundwork To Change U.S. Role In The World

By Karen Deyoung And Philip Rucker

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

President Trump began this week to reshape the U.S. role in the world, laying the groundwork, in a series of planned and signed executive actions and statements, for the "America first" foreign policy on which he campaigned.

Already, Trump has mandated construction of a border wall with Mexico and a clampdown on local immigration enforcement. Other directives drafted but not yet signed would halt all refu-gee admissions and entry into the United States of citizens from seven Muslim-majority countries deemed terrorist hotbeds; declare a moratorium on new multilateral treaties; and mandate audits of U.S. funding for international organizations, including the United Nations, with a view toward cutting U.S. voluntary contributions by 40 percent.

Additional pending orders, copies of which were obtained by The Washington Post, call for a review of cyber capabilities and vulnerabilities, in advance of what is expected to be greater use of offensive powers; and direct the Pentagon to quickly develop plans to reduce spending on items not deemed "highest priority," while ramping up programs to expand the armed forces and modernize the U.S. nuclear deterrent.

Another draft order under consideration would direct the State Department to review its designations of foreign terrorist organizations, allowing it to add the Muslim Brotherhood to the list, according to an administration official who was not authorized to discuss it. The group's status as a legitimate political movement vs. a terrorist group is controversial in the Middle East. Such a listing would please some, including Egypt and Saudi Arabia, but could anger others, such as Turkey and Qatar.

Trump could sign some of these orders as early as Friday during a scheduled visit to the Pentagon. The White House declined to comment on the directives.

If implemented, these initiatives and other steps Trump has previewed will usher in a new era of American foreign policy, after decades of bipartisan agreement that the United States has a responsibility to spread democracy and stand up for the oppressed, and that it would prosper when a united, free world prospered.

In the policies Trump has outlined, there are no apparent trade-offs to be made that balance short-term American advantage with global goals benefiting the United States over the longer term. Instead, as a policy posted on the White House website on Inauguration Day put it, "The world will be more peaceful and more prosperous with a stronger and more respected America."

"Every decision on trade, on taxes, on immigration, on foreign affairs will be made to benefit American workers and American families," Trump said in his inauguration speech. "We must protect our borders from the ravages of other countries making our products, stealing our companies and destroying our jobs. Protection will lead to great prosperity and strength."

Trump sees himself as the protector of an American fortress and disrupter of a world that is growing more calamitous and dangerous by the day. "The world is a total mess," he said Wednesday in an interview with ABC News.

At times, it is difficult to determine whether he is laying down the law or establishing a negotiating position. Having pushed Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto into a corner on funding the border wall, the administration indicated Thursday that it considered Mexico's cancellation of a presidential visit to Washington a mere postponement.

Kori Schake, a former national security official in the George W. Bush administration who opposed Trump's candidacy, said the executive orders are already causing political damage with U.S. allies. "It's consistent with the way in which President Trump creates chaos and moves blithely on," she said.

Many of Trump's ideas are not new, although they draw from a wide political spectrum. Trump's reimagining of a new 21st-century architecture for world order, including a sharp reduction in U.S. participation in international institutions, has been a rallying cry for conservatives for years.

His words and actions reflect "a view that the status quo that has essentially grown up over the last 70 years costs the U.S. more than it benefits it," said Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a senior official in the George H.W. Bush administration. That view, extending from trade policy to traditional alliances, Haass said, "is fundamentally flawed in its assumption that American involvement and leadership in the world has cost us more than it's gained us, but that nonetheless appears to be their vision."

The United Nations, with its welter of sometimes obscure sub-organizations, and the platform it often provides for criticism of the United States, has been a long-standing target.

Two of the treaties that Trump's proposed executive order makes particular mention of as forcing adherence to "radical domestic agendas" — the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and the Convention on the Rights of the Child — are traditional bull's eyes. Like many other U.N.-generated treaties, they have never been ratified by the United States.

Trump proposes internal high-level committees to examine multilateral treaties, with a view toward leaving them, as well as a 40 percent cut in funding for international organizations whose agendas are "contrary to American interests." It is unclear whether the intent is to cut funds for U.N. activities such as peacekeeping forces- and humanitarian programs, as well as those, already targeted by Trump, that support Palestinians and other groups out of favor with the new administration.

John B. Bellinger III, who served as legal counsel to both the National Security Council and the State Department in the George W. Bush administration, said the treaty examination was based on a "false premise . . . that the United States has become party to numerous multi-lateral treaties that are not in the United States' interest."

There are "many hundreds of multi-lateral treaties that help Americans every day in concrete ways," he said. Without them, "Americans could not have our letters delivered in foreign countries; could not fly over foreign countries or drive on foreign roads using our state driver's licenses; could not have access to a foreign consular official if we are arrested abroad; could not have our children returned if abducted by a parent; and could not prevent foreign ships from polluting our waters."

While mandates for building a border wall, boosting immigration law enforcement and barring refugees will take immediate effect, others buy time by establishing committees and reviews.

The draft Pentagon order begins by stating, "It shall be the policy of the United States to pursue Peace Through Strength." It directs Defense Secretary James Mattis to produce a National Defense Strategy — something virtually every administration regularly does — by the beginning of 2018.

There is little apparent controversy in the draft executive order to strengthen cybersecurity, a six-page document that in tone and substance could have been written by the Obama administration. It calls for no bold initiatives but rather for review of areas Trump's predecessor had already scrutinized.

One line in the proposed order appeared to signal that the new administration might want to reorganize agencies or boost legal authorities to better protect the country's civilian government networks and critical infrastructure.

Even as Trump sets direction with executive orders, the White House is trying to exert direct control over policymaking at federal departments and agencies. Although offices in many departments sit empty as Cabinet nominees await confirmation, and sub-Cabinet positions are not yet filled, senior advisers have been deployed from the West Wing as liaisons to some departments, to ensure the work that is being done is in keeping with White House priorities.

Of the suggestion that at least some of Trump's moves so far may be largely symbolic and eventual policies could become more traditional, Schake said, "Oh my God, that's the hopeful interpretation — that he's trying to take rapid symbolic gestures that will please his base and that the policy details can get worked out subsequently when he has a Cabinet in place."

"The downside, of course, is it brings all of the diplomatic and economic downsides of having taken the policy action, even if it's only a symbolic gesture," she said.

Mexican President Scraps Visit With Trump

By Jordan Fabian

The Hill, January 26, 2017

Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto said Thursday he will not attend a planned meeting next week with President Trump.

"This morning we informed the White House that I will not attend the work meeting planned for next Tuesday with @POTUS," Peña Nieto tweeted in announcing the cancellation.

Esta mañana hemos informado a la Casa Blanca que no asistiré a la reunión de trabajo programada para el próximo martes con el @POTUS.— Enrique Peña Nieto (@EPN) January 26, 2017

Speaking to a Republican lawmakers at their retreat in Philadelphia, Trump claimed he and Peña Nieto "agreed to cancel our planned meeting."

"Unless Mexico is going to treat the U.S. fairly, such a meeting would be fruitless," the president said.

The move escalates brewing tensions between the two neighboring countries on hot-button issues such as immigration and trade.

The Mexican leader was irked by Trump's announcement that he plans to move forward with his plan to erect a wall along the U.S. southern border — and eventually force Mexico to foot the bill.

"The U.S. has a 60 billion dollar trade deficit with Mexico," Trump wrote in a series of tweets Thursday morning. "It has been a one-sided deal from the beginning of NAFTA with massive numbers of jobs and companies lost. If Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting."

That prompted Trump to urge Peña Nieto to call off the meeting, scheduled for Jan. 31.

White House press secretary Sean Spicer told reporters the get-together would be rescheduled.

"We'll look for a date to schedule something in the future," he said.

The budding controversy could lead to economic fallout for both countries.

The value of the Mexican peso plunged after Peña Nieto announced he would call off the meeting.

Mexico is the U.S.'s third-largest trading partner and is the second-largest export market for American-made goods, according to the U.S. Trade Representative.

Democrats slammed Trump over the cancellation, saying he was putting at risk the relationship with an important partner.

"Less than one week after taking office, President Trump is already causing serious damage to one of our most important relationships in the world. U.S. national security depends directly on cooperation with our neighbors," said

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.), ranking member of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee in a statement.

And House Foreign Affairs Ranking Member Rep. Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) touted cooperation between the two countries, and accused Trump of putting "our own security at risk."

"The January 19th extradition of drug kingpin Chapo Guzmán to New York was a major victory for the Obama and Peña Nieto Administrations that never would have been possible without a robust U.S.-Mexico partnership," Engel said.

The tensions with Mexico come after Trump on Wednesday signed two executive orders on immigration, one ordering construction of a border wall.

As Trump announced the moves at the Department of Homeland Security, top administration officials were meeting at the White House with two of Peña Nieto's cabinet secretaries.

The orders prompted Peña Nieto to release a video in which he said the 50 Mexican consulates in the U.S. would "become authentic defenders of the rights of migrants."

Peña Nieto, whose approval rating is currently 12 percent, faced calls to cancel the trip Wednesday night from politicians in Mexico, who saw Trump's wall announcement as a slight.

The pressure intensified Thursday morning as Mexicans woke up to Trump's tweets.

Margarita Zavala, a top contender for the presidency in the upcoming 2018 elections and wife of former President Felipe Calderon, called the tweets a "humiliation."

"The vacuum that @EPN left yesterday was filled today by @realDonaldTrump with yet another humiliation. We require firmness and to put #MexicoFirst," she tweeted.

Historian Enrique Krauze took a different tone, saying patience would be rewarded in dealing with Trump.

"Trump is demented and he will probably destroy himself. We must win time with patience, strength and dignity," Reforma newspaper quoted Krauze as saying.

The two leaders' political fates have been intertwined since August, when Trump visited Peña Nieto mid-campaign in Mexico City. That visit cost then-Secretary of Finance Luis Videgaray his job, amid perceptions that he played a key role in arranging it.

The visit was allegedly arranged through a mutual friend of Videgaray and Jared Kushner, Trump's son-in-law and now a White House advisor.

Videgaray returned to the cabinet, this time as Foreign Relations secretary, after Trump's November victory, vowing to take the lead in U.S.-Mexico relations.

Videgaray was, along with Secretary of the Economy Ildefonso Guajardo, one of the officials meeting White House officials Wednesday and Thursday.

Outraged Mexicans Back Peña Nieto's Decision To Scrap Visit With 'Bully' Trump

By David Agren

USA Today, January 26, 2017

MEXICO CITY — Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto canceled next week's meeting with President Trump at the White House just hours after the American president issued an ultimatum that Mexico scrap the visit if it won't pay for a wall he plans to build along the U.S -Mexican border.

Under pressure from outraged citizens to stand up to Trump, Peña Nieto tweeted on Thursday, "This morning we have informed the White House that I will not attend the meeting scheduled for next Tuesday with the @POTUS."

Peña Nieto made the decision after Mexicans lashed out at Trump, calling the president a bully and self-indulgent and vowing not be be pushed around by him.

In a pair of Thursday morning tweets, Trump accused Mexico of unfair trade with the United States and told Peña Nieto to stay home if Mexico won't pay to build a wall and other barriers along the full 2,000-mile border between the two countries, a massive project estimated to cost billions.

That seemed to suit Mexicans just fine, as they urged Peña Nieto to cancel the trip.

Peña Nieto posted a short video Wednesday night, saying Mexico would not pay for the wall and that the Foreign Ministry would step up its defense of Mexican migrants living in the U.S.

"I regret and reject the decision of the U.S. to build the wall," Peña Nieto said. He added though, "Mexico reaffirms its friendship with the people of the United States and its willingness to reach agreements with its government."

Others reacted to Trump with far greater fury on Thursday.

"Donald, don't be self-indulgent. Mexico has spoken, we will never ever pay for the #(expletive) Wall," former Mexican president Vicente Fox tweeted in response to Trump's tweet.

"It's inadmissible the treatment that @realDonaldTrump is giving Mexico. The response to his irresponsible actions should be firm. #SinMuros [No walls,]" tweeted 2012 presidential candidate Josefina Vázquez Mota.

"After this, if (Foreign Minister) Luis Videgaray and (Economy Minister) Ildefonso Guajardo don't get up from the table and leave, we're lost," said political analyst Fernando Dworak, referring to the two cabinet members currently in Washington. "If we don't do anything today, we deserve even more."

Trump pummeled Mexico during his presidential campaign, repeatedly accusing the U.S. neighbor of unfair trade and allowing criminals into the United States. He also scolded U.S. automakers for moving plants to Mexico.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"The U.S. has a 60 billion dollar trade deficit with Mexico. It has been a one-sided deal from the beginning of NAFTA with massive numbers..." Trump tweeted Thursday.

"… of jobs and companies lost. If Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting," Trump said in a second tweet.

On Wednesday, Trump signed an executive order calling for construction of a border wall.

Analyst Dworak criticized Peña Nieto, whose approval rating registers just 12%, for failing to stand up to Trump.

"There's a national crisis and we have a political class that's over their heads and unable to articulate a discourse or vision," Dworak said. "For them, it's enough to get out of the way and pretend to play the part of patriot."

Many Mexicans reacted with surprise when Trump officially ordered construction of the wall because they had considered the proposal mere campaign talk by an underdog to win the U.S. presidential election. Some suggested boycotting U.S. brands — "Adiós Starbucks" trended on Twitter — in a country with strong pro-American sentiment since NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement, was enacted in 1994.

Foreign Minister Videgaray told the Televisa network that his talks at the White House on Wednesday were "a very positive start to conversations about very substantial topics."

Peña Nieto appointed Videgaray to the diplomatic post in early January, just four months after Videgaray resigned as finance minister because he had lobbied for Peña Nieto to invite candidate Trump to Mexico City in August for an ill-fated meeting in the president palace. The encounter drew complaints from Mexicans that their leader didn't react forcefully to a man who has denigrated them as a country and people.

"For the second time in four months, Videgaray should resign. It's clear there isn't a valid interlocutor with the Trump government," said Esteban Illades, editor of the Mexican magazine Nexos.

"Look at the results: (Videgaray) spent eight hours in the White House yesterday and in return he got a tweet saying that the only way the presidents will talk is if there is payment agreed on the wall."

Peña Nieto's decision won praise though most Mexicans wondered why he seemed to dither before reacting.

"It's too late, but at least it's something. He didn't have any other option left," Illades said. "He knew he wouldn't be able to take on Trump in Washington. And that last [Trump] tweet was the final coffin."

Mexico's President Cancels Planned D.C. Trip To Meet With Trump : The Two-Way : NPR

By Merrit Kennedy

NPR, January 26, 2017

President Trump said on Twitter this morning that "if Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting" with Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto.

Hours later, Peña Nieto did just that. His spokesman tells NPR's Carrie Kahn in Mexico City that the president has cancelled Tuesday's visit to Washington D.C., without elaborating.

Trump signed an executive order Wednesday that moves ahead with his plan to build a wall along the U.S. border with Mexico — a policy he described as one in partnership with Mexico and from which both countries will benefit.

But as Carrie reports, Mexico's leader released a video later that night in which he forcefully condemned Trump's plan, calling it divisive. "I have repeatedly said, 'Mexico will not pay for a wall,' " Peña Nieto said.

In the video, Peña Nieto had stopped short of cancelling his trip, saying he was still waiting to hear the latest from his negotiators in Washington. And as Carrie reports, he was under significant pressure from lawmakers to scrap the visit.

"We will look for a date to schedule something in the future," White House press secretary Sean Spicer told reporters after Peña Nieto cancelled. "We will keep the lines of communication open."

Congress Will Consider Up To $15 Billion For Border Wall, GOP Leaders Say

By Erin Kelly

USA Today, January 26, 2017

PHILADELPHIA — Congressional leaders said Thursday they expect the Trump administration to send them a request soon for $12 billion to $15 billion to fund construction of a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border.

It was the first time that Republican leaders have provided a price tag for the wall.

"We intend to address the wall issue ourselves," Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., told reporters on the second day of a three-day retreat for congressional Republicans.

Congress will take up President Trump's expected request before the end of September, when fiscal 2017 ends, said House Speaker Paul Ryan, R-Wis. It will be in the form of an emergency budget request, meaning that it will not be part of the regular spending bill to fund the government from April 28 through September. Current funding for federal agencies is set to expire on April 28 under a temporary spending bill passed last week.

If funding for the wall was part of the broader spending bill that Congress must pass in April, it could conceivably lead to a government shutdown since Democrats will oppose it.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ryan said the funding request will allow Congress to finally carry out the Secure Fence Act, which lawmakers passed in 2006 to construct a series of fences and walls along the Southwest border.

"Now we're actually going to deploy this fence," Ryan said.

Trump had campaigned on a promise to build the border wall and make Mexico pay for it. He is now saying that Mexico will reimburse U.S. taxpayers for the cost, despite assertions by Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto that his country will not pick up the tab.

Read more:

Democrats said a wall can't take the place of comprehensive immigration reform that includes border security, visa changes and a pathway to citizenship for the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants already living in the country. They also were upset that an emergency request to fund the wall can be done without GOP leaders having to make offsetting budget cuts to pay for it.

"As far as the wall is concerned, I suspect that a lot of Trump supporters would be just as happy with a big statue of a middle finger pointed south, because both that and a wall are about equally effective as national security strategies," said Rep. Luis Gutiérrez, D-Ill.

McConnell and Ryan insisted that they are working on coordination with Trump, despite the fact that the new president's controversial announcements this week on torture, voter fraud and immigration have taken attention away from their focus on health care, tax reform and reducing government regulation.

Ryan said he and McConnell have been working with the White House on those legislative priorities "so, yes, we are on the same page."

The two leaders said they expect to enact a tax overhaul and repeal and replace the Affordable Care Act — better known as Obamacare — before Congress adjourns for its annual August recess.

"I intend to stick to the plan and make as much progress as we can," McConnell said.

Ryan said congressional leaders have adopted a legislative agenda for the first 200 days of the Trump administration rather than the first 100 days because the Senate will be busy confirming about 1,200 of the president's nominees for government jobs.

"It's a very bold and aggressive agenda," Ryan said. "At the end of the day, if we get these things done, we really believe we're going to get the country back on the right track and turn things around for the people who elected us."

GOP Leaders Won't Say How They'll Pay For $12 Billion-$15 Billion Cost Of Border Wall

By Sean Sullivan

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

PHILADELPHIA — Congressional Republican leaders said Thursday that they plan to move forward with legislation to provide $12 billion to $15 billion to pay for a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, but they declined to specify where that funding would come from, continuing the uncertainty over one of President Trump's signature campaign promises.

The comments from House Speaker Paul D. Ryan and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) at a GOP retreat here came as controversy over Trump's proposed wall set off a fresh round of international discord, as Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto canceled a planned visit with Trump.

Asked whether spending on the wall would be offset — meaning that there would be corresponding spending cuts elsewhere in the government or some other means of covering the funding — Ryan punted.

"As far as the offset, we're going to wait and see from the administration what their supplemental [spending plan] looks like," said Ryan. "I'm not going to get ahead of a policy and a bill that has not been written yet, But the point is we are going to finance the Secure Fence Act, which is the construction of the physical barrier on the border."

Asked if he could guarantee if the broader Republican agenda would not add to the deficit, Ryan did not respond directly.

"We're fiscal conservatives," he said. "What that means is we believe government should not live beyond its means. We believe that hardworking taxpayers in this country deserve a break in this country. And that means Washington takes less money from them and we also spend less, here."

Trump campaigned on the promise of building a wall that he claimed would curb illegal immigration and disrupt the drug trade. In an interview with ABC News broadcast Wednesday, Trump said taxpayers would initially foot the bill for the wall, but "we will be in a form reimbursed by Mexico." He did not lay out precisely how that would happen.

Mexico has said it will not pay for a wall. Peña Nieto canceled next week's planned meeting with Trump hours after Trump tweeted, "If Mexico is unwilling to pay for the badly needed wall, then it would be better to cancel the upcoming meeting."

The president planned to address GOP lawmakers at the retreat Thursday afternoon.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters here Thursday that lawmakers and officials needs to be more precise when they talk about building a wall and that a single physical barrier likely will likely not suffice.

"When you say, quote, 'build a wall', what does that exactly mean?" McCain said. "It means to me drones, technology, surveillance, all that. If you're talking about just building a wall, history shows that you can tunnel under them, you can breach them and you can climb over them."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

McCain predicted that there will a "downpayment to begin construction" of border security, but it will not be anywhere near $15 billion. He said he believes that Department of Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly, through his agency, will be critical in winning support in Congress for whatever plan is devised.

McConnell and Ryan declined to wade into Trump's relationship with Peña Nieto.

"I don't have any advice to give to the president about that issue," said McConnell. He said that while Congress intends to address the construction of the wall, he will leave the president's interaction with foreign leaders to him.

Asked if he had any concerns about Mexico's relationship with the United States, Ryan (R-Wis.) replied, "I think it'll be fine."

White House Says Tax On Mexican Imports Would Pay For Border Wall

Trump Is Starting A Trade War We Don't Need

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

UNTIL A few days ago, the U.S.-Mexico relationship was a strong one that benefited both countries. In the first week of his term, President Trump seems determined to change that — and for no good reason.

After decades of economic integration, the United States and its southern neighbor have established a valuable trading relationship exchanging $1.4 billion in goods every day. Mexico is the second-largest foreign market for U.S.-made products. Trade and investment between the two nations create wealth for both nations, and for innumerable American companies, workers and consumers, all of whom would be harmed by a trade war. Moreover, Mexico has become a valuable partner in promoting liberal values, having institutionalized multi-party democracy and steadily increased economic freedoms within its borders. As it has matured into a middle-class nation, the flow of Mexicans north has reversed, with more returning home in recent years than migrating to the United States.

In deference to this mutually beneficial relationship, Mexican President Enrique Peña Nieto has strained against provocation to get along with Mr. Trump. He invited him to a meeting in Mexico City last year, to Mr. Trump's political benefit and at Mr. Peña Nieto's own political risk. He was planning a visit to Washington next week to look for constructive cooperation.

Then, boom. Mr. Trump planted a stick of dynamite under a structure that leaders of various parties in both nations have been carefully constructing for decades. And for what?

The president first announced this week that he intended to proceed with construction of an expensive and unnecessary border wall, fulfilling a campaign promise based on misunderstandings of both the extent of illegal immigration and the best way to deal with it. Then Mr. Trump revived his pledge that Mexico would finance its construction. The humiliation was too much to bear for Mr. Peña Nieto, who faced understandable political pressure at home. The Mexican president canceled a scheduled meeting with Mr. Trump.

At that point, wiser heads still could have defused and de-escalated. Instead, White House press secretary Sean Spicer announced that the president is considering a new tax on Mexican imports to pay for his gratuitous wall. Mr. Spicer, without providing many details, suggested the tax would raise some $10 billion a year. He later explained that this is just one of several options. Depending on its design, such an imposition could indeed hurt Mexico. But it also would likely act as a tax on American consumers of Mexican goods. American consumers, that is, would pay for the wall by paying higher prices for Mexican-grown tomatoes, Mexican-sewn clothing and Mexican-built cars.

U.S. officials should reach out and seek to repair the week's damage. It took the United States nearly a decade to recover from the economic wreckage of the last recession. A wealth-destroying trade war with one of America's closest partners would threaten that long-sought recovery.

Trump's 20% Mexican Border Tariff Would Impact Auto Industry

By Brent Snavely, Gregory Korte And Todd Spangler

Detroit Free Press, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump's plan for a wall along the Mexican border could be financed through a 20% border tax on all imports from Mexico, a new detail in the evolving saga between the U.S. and Mexico that would have a direct impact on the U.S. automotive industry.

"It clearly provides the funding and does so in a way that the American taxpayer is wholly respected," White House press secretary Sean Spicer told reporters. “We are probably the only major country that doesn’t treat imports this way.”

Trump’s campaign promise to build a wall along the Mexican border and the president’s desire to renegotiate the North American Free Trade Agreement by bringing automotive jobs back to the U.S. have been in the spotlight throughout the week.

Several automotive executives have said that the costs of a steep border tariff could be offset by Trump’s plan to lower corporate taxes and relax fuel economy and other regulations. Wall Street analysts estimate a tariff could raise prices of vehicles from Mexico by $2,300.

“A 20% tariff would raise the cost of manufacturing in North America, cutting into the competitiveness of all three countries,” said Christopher Wilson, deputy director of the Mexico Institute at the Woodrow Wilson International Center in Washington. “The tariff would violate NAFTA and WTO norms, and quite likely provoke retaliation from Mexico.”

Spicer announced the policy proposal in an unannounced “gaggle” with reporters on Air Force One on Thursday, underscoring just how quickly the Trump White House is churning out policy proposals in his first week in office.

Shortly afterward, Spicer clarified to a separate group of reporters in the West Wing that it was just one proposal. “There are clearly a bunch of ways it can be done,” he said. “The point is American taxpayers are not going to fund it.”

White House Chief of Staff Reince Priebus added that it was part of a “buffet” of options.

Representatives of Fiat Chrysler, Ford and General Motors declined to comment on the 20% tariff idea Thursday afternoon.

Portrayed at first as a policy proposal, Spicer’s comments were nearly immediately walked back by the White House as an example of options that are being explored.

Whatever it is, the idea is part of a broader topic that has been simmering within the U.S. automotive industry for months and has reached a boiling point.

CEOs for the Detroit Three all joined Trump earlier this week to talk about free trade, jobs, U.S. investments and regulations.

On Thursday morning, both Sergio Marchionne, CEO of Fiat Chrysler Automobiles, and Mark Fields, CEO of Ford, answered questions about Trump and his trade policies during financial reporting calls with Wall Street.

Marchionne said most of the policies that President Donald Trump is proposing would benefit the automotive industry but warned that dismantling NAFTA could have “monumental consequences” for the industry.

“The question about repatriation of all of the manufacturing footprint into the United States has got monumental consequences to the industry overall,” Marchionne said before Spicer’s comment about a 20% tariff. “I think there are repercussions that go well beyond FCA.”

Marchionne applauded Trump’s goal of reducing corporate taxes and said the new president’s policy goals could prompt the automaker to move some jobs from Mexico to the U.S.

“We have run the numbers, and overall they are good things,” Marchionne said. “The policy direction that is being taken by President Trump is something we appreciate.”

Ford CFO Bob Shanks also told Wall Street that the Dearborn automaker is counting on other policy proposals to offset the cost of any tariff.

“When you combine it with some of the other aspects of the blueprint like the lower tax rate and some of the other aspects ... that’s what gives us, at least for now, a positive point of view on that particular proposal,” Shanks said.

GM also declined to comment on Spicer’s comments on Thursday. But earlier in the week, GM CEO Mary Barra also expressed a positive view of Trump’s overall approach to the automotive industry.

“The U.S. is our home market and we are eager to come together to reinvigorate U.S. manufacturing,” Barra said in a statement. “We all want a vibrant U.S. manufacturing base that is competitive globally and that grows jobs. It’s good for our employees, our dealers, our suppliers and our customers.”

The unexpected proposal and subsequent backtracking underscored just how quickly the Trump White House is churning out policy proposals in a hectic first week in office, with a crowded calendar of meetings, speeches and executive actions.

The border tax plan would need congressional approval, and Spicer described it as the beginning of a process that would be part of overall tax reform. The tax proposal would have the benefit of dovetailing two of his signature policies: curtailing illegal immigration and enacting more protectionist trade regulations.

But the proposal could face resistance even among Republicans.

“Border security yes, tariffs no,” Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., wrote on Twitter. “Simply put, any policy proposal which drives up costs of Corona, tequila, or margaritas is a big-time bad idea. Mucho Sad.”

The U.S. trade deficit with Mexico was $49.2 billion in 2015, according to the U.S. Trade Representative. Though Spicer didn’t explain how the tax would work, the principle is similar to a border adjustment tax currently being discussed in Congress, which would heavily tax imports but give a tax credit on exports.

“Right now our country’s policy is to tax exports and let imports flow freely in, which is ridiculous,” Spicer said.

Spicer ran through the math by applying 20% to the difference, coming up with nearly $10 billion a year.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The U.S. could "easily pay for the wall just through that mechanism alone. That's really going to provide the funding," he said.

Actual imports from Mexico totaled $316.4 billion in 2015. A good portion of that is from the automotive industry.

Mexico has become the seventh largest vehicle producer in the world. There are currently a number of manufacturers with a presence in Mexico, including GM, Fiat Chrysler, Ford, Nissan, Honda, Toyota, VW, Mazda and Kia.

This manufacturing base produces 42 brands and 500 models in 22 manufacturing plants and has a network of 1,800 dealers, according to the U.S. Trade Representative.

'Finally': Trump's Illegal Immigration Crackdown Wins Praise From Some Activists

By Cindy Carcamo And Dakota Smith, Contact Reporters

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump's crackdown on illegal immigration has sparked concern from many California politicians. But it is winning praise from activists who for years have been trying to reduce illegal immigration.

Robin Hvidston, executive director of We The People Rising, an anti-illegal immigration organization based in Claremont, said Trump's actions bring new hope to activists like her.

The organization has turned out to meetings in Rialto and Huntington Park and of the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors to oppose sanctuary measures.

"Ending sanctuary cities is a way to restore the rule of law to the cities of California and throughout the United States," she said. "We … are happy and encouraged that, after decades of federal lawbreaking, a president is finally taking action to enforce federal immigration laws."

Roy H. Beck, who heads NumbersUSA, a powerful national advocacy group opposing illegal immigration, praised Trump's move.

"The new policies announced on sanctuary cities finally put federal executive action on the side of the victims and potential victims of crime instead of protecting the interests of the businesses and organizations who profit from keeping as many illegal migrants in the country as possible."

Two decades ago, California was a hotbed for the anti-illegal immigration movement. In 1994, California voters approved Proposition 187, which was meant to cut many public services for people here illegally. (The law was later ruled unconstitutional.)

But more recent political and demographic shifts have made California decidedly more welcoming to those here without proper papers.

More than 400 jurisdictions across the country have some sort of "sanctuary" policy aimed at welcoming those here illegally, including Los Angeles, San Francisco and about 40 others in California.

Details about Trump's crackdown remain unclear. On Wednesday, the president signed two executive orders designed to begin building a wall along the border with Mexico, add lockups for detaining immigrants who cross the border illegally, enhance enforcement powers for border agents and strip federal funding to cities that refuse to cooperate with immigration enforcement.

According to a draft document reviewed by The Times, under the new order, the federal government would threaten to withhold funds from so-called sanctuary cities that limit cooperation with immigration officials.

Many political leaders both in big cities and in Sacramento have vowed to fight Trump.

Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti told reporters Wednesday that he doesn't believe the federal government can stop funding for L.A. and cited the 10th Amendment, which addresses the powers of state and federal governments.

"We feel very strong the legal case is clear," Garcetti said.

The particulars of Trump's orders are still being dissected by Los Angeles leaders. But City Council President Herb Wesson told reporters that "the city is going to continue to operate the way it operates."

Los Angeles will receive about $500 million this fiscal year from the federal government to pay for an array of services, including port security, anti-gang programs and senior citizen services.

San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee said he doesn't foresee any changes in his city's sanctuary policies. Officials in San Jose said much the same thing.

Better Barriers Are Worth The Cost: Opposing View

By Dan Stein

USA Today, January 26, 2017

On Wednesday, President Trump ordered completion of border security measures that were promised by Congress in 2006 but never fulfilled. The centerpiece of the president's order is secure barriers (a wall, perhaps) along the areas of the border required to achieve operational security. It also includes upgrades in electronic monitoring of the border and an additional 5,000 border agents. All of these things are badly needed to gain control of the border, and would help both Mexico and the U.S. eliminate cartel operations.

Who will pay is now under debate. Regardless of who pays, it is a great deal for taxpayers. U.S. taxpayers now absorb recurring costs in excess of $100 billion a year to provide basic services to illegal aliens and their children. Even at the high end of the one-time cost estimate for constructing a wall, in the $15 billion and $25 billion range, the structures are cheap at twice the price.

While border security infrastructure is important to stemming the flow of illegal immigration and protecting national security, it is just one component of an overall strategy. Equally important, we must give people reasons not to cross our borders illegally in the first place.

President Trump has also taken the first steps toward ending the magnets that draw large numbers of illegal aliens to this country, while adding deterrence through the end of "catch and release" folly. On Wednesday, he put sanctuary jurisdictions with non-cooperation policies on notice: Maintain those policies and forfeit billions of federal dollars. Trump will insist Congress send a bill that mandates the use of E-Verify by all employers, thereby finally — after years of waiting — addressing the lure of jobs in this country.

Our relationship with Mexico is important, even vital. But it must be based on a mutuality of respect for our borders and our laws.

This integrated border and interior enforcement strategy will restore our national footing as a nation that will enforce its laws and protect the public interest.

Immigrants Rights Activists Rally Against Trump Orders

By Jessica Kwong

Orange County (CA) Register, January 25, 2017

SANTA ANA – Several dozen immigrants rights activists rallied outside the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services field office Thursday morning against executive orders President Donald Trump signed a day earlier, pledging continued support for marginalized communities.

Trump's orders on Wednesday to begin building a border wall and pulling federal money from sanctuary cities are "un-American," said Mirvette Judeh Maaytah, vice chairwoman of the Arab American Civic Council.

Roberto Herrera, a community engagement advocate for Resilience OC, said his group and others at the rally will defend the sanctuary ordinance Santa Ana adopted Jan. 17 and, "if anything, we need to push ordinances across other cities."

"Our objective is to get folks to recognize that Orange County communities are united against Trump," Herrera said. "Being in the conservative county in California, the organizations here are united to stand strong and to lead."

Trump Orders 'Tear Our Families Apart'

By Niraj Warikoo

Detroit Free Press, January 26, 2017

Her eyes welling up, a 28-year-old mother of three in Detroit said she was worried that her life in America could end as President Donald Trump vowed this week to crack down on immigration.

"We're afraid," said Jasmine Lomeli, 28, a native of Mexico who came to the U.S. in 2002 as a teen with her parents. "We don't know what's going to happen. ... I don't know if I will be separated from my kids."

Lomeli's fears echo throughout Michigan, where many undocumented immigrants and their children worry after Trump announced on Wednesday executive orders that crack down on them and punish cities that seek to protect them. Lomeli's parents came to the U.S. without legal permission, bringing Lomeli along when she was 14-year-old.

Today she is the mother of three children, ages 10, 8, and 4, all born in the U.S. Lomeli is a DACA (Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals) recipient, a program created under President Barack Obama that allowed her to work and stay legally in the U.S. DACA spares her from worrying about being deported and separated from her kids or about doing basic tasks such as driving. Many undocumented immigrants fear being pulled over by law enforcement and then later deported.

She worries that Trump could end the program: "With DACA, we feel safe, and now, we don't know what's going to happen."

But she and others are determined to fight back. On Thursday, she joined a wide range of immigrant and minority groups who spoke out against Trump's executive orders, saying the orders unfairly target immigrants and Muslims. They gathered in Detroit at the office of Michigan United, an advocacy group.

"We're here to stay," Lomeli said. "We're going to fight to stop discrimination against people. ... I'm going to fight for my children."

Trump has expressed sympathy for DACA recipients, but some advocates say his orders indicate that the program could be removed. It's unclear whether DACA will remain.

"We will not allow Trump to take this program away," she said. "We'll fight for our rights."

Adonis Flores, the immigrant rights coordinator at Michigan United who's a DACA recipient, said, "Donald Trump is trying to tear our families apart with the stroke of a pen. As a community, we are resilient and will resist with our whole strength. As a country we are stronger than his hateful and divisive policies. This isn't about fixing our broken immigration system — this is about demonizing vulnerable families to score cheap political points."

Trump is also expected to sign another executive order this week that targets Muslim immigrants from seven countries and refugees, cutting their numbers and stopping all visitors from some countries. Three of the countries that

Trump is targeting — Iraq, Syria and Yemen — have large immigration populations in metro Detroit.

Local community and religious leaders vowed to push back against his plans, including holding seminars to educate people of their rights and developing a network of churches that would be sanctuaries for immigrants.

At the press conference held at Michigan United offices, Brendan Wu, a community organizer with the Michigan branch of the Asian-American advocacy group Asian Pacific Islander American Vote, slammed Trump's plan that targets Muslims, saying it echoes the idea behind the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II.

Trump is reportedly planning to allow exceptions to his restrictions on refugees from Muslim-majority countries for religious minority groups, such as Christians.

"This turns our immigration system into a religious filter, one that says your faith is what makes you ineligible and unwanted," Wu said. "If you think that today, they're just after Muslims, or they're just after Hispanics, remember that these policies are just the start. We have seen this movie before.

"Only 65 years ago, the military locked an entire population for the sole crime of being Japanese," Wu said, referring to the internment of Japanese Americans during WWII. "My brothers and sisters in the Muslim and Latino communities are targets today, but my family could very well be next on the list."

Wu and other speakers urged unity across racial, ethnic and religious lines to fight back against Trump's plans.

"We will overcome this together," said Sergio Martinez of Detroit, an immigrant from Mexico who's with Michigan United. "We will overcome hate with love. ... No matter what Trump says, we are here to stay."

Trump's plans brought mixed reaction from elected officials.

Asked if he favored restrictions on refugees that Trump is expected to announce, Gov. Snyder said Thursday at the Capitol:

"He has to make those decisions. That's not a responsibility at the state level. I'm going to continue to promote Michigan as a welcoming place for immigrants.

"That's something that's important that ties right into the theme of growing Michigan in terms of our population."

Asked about Trump possibly calling on state and local police to enforce immigration laws, Snyder said he didn't see that as one of their primary responsibilities. He said police in Michigan are doing a good job of reducing crime.

Advocates for immigrant rights are concerned about Trump's order to target sanctuary cities by cutting off federal funding if they harbor undocumented immigrants. In recent weeks, the mayors of cities including Boston, New York and San Francisco have publicly defended their cities as sanctuary cities and criticized Trump in news conferences, but the office of Detroit Mayor Mike Duggan has said that the city of Detroit is not a sanctuary city as Trump defines it.

In a statement Thursday to the Free Press, Duggan's chief of staff, Alexis Wiley, said "the President's Executive Order does not affect any policy or practice in the City of Detroit."

Wiley said Trump's order "will have no effect on any operation of the City of Detroit. The Detroit Police Department has always cooperated with federal customs and immigration officials on law enforcement. A decade ago, the Detroit City Council passed an ordinance which banned the practice of improper profiling, which it labeled a 'Sanctuary City Ordinance.' The Detroit City ordinance does not contain any of the provisions to which the President's Executive Order are directed.

"If the definition of a Sanctuary City is one in which people are not profiled because of their appearance, Detroit is a Sanctuary City," Wiley added. "If the definition of a Sanctuary City is one in which local law enforcement refuses to cooperate with federal customs and immigration officials, Detroit is not a Sanctuary City."

There are about 97,000 to more than 126,000 undocumented immigrants in Michigan, out of more than 11 million nationwide.

"Law enforcement experts across the country have pointed out that sanctuary city policies can actually deter crime, as such policies make it more likely that undocumented immigrants will report crime and cooperate with law enforcement," said state Rep. Stephanie Chang, D-Detroit. "Building that trust is critical to helping our country move forward. In addition, I am very concerned that opening up the priorities for deportation may to have a devastating impact on residents of southwest Detroit in my district."

State Rep. Abdullah Hammoud, D-Dearborn, whose district has a sizable Arab immigrant population, said that Trump's "orders in no way resemble good policy. ... Threatening to withhold funding from cities offering a public service you disagree with does not properly address America's immigration concerns. Our focus should instead be on humane and responsible comprehensive immigration reform."

Arab-American groups slammed Trump's planned order, saying it discriminates against Arabs and Muslims. A draft copy of Trump's expected executive order on refugees and Muslim immigrants obtained by the Los Angeles Times makes references to honor killings and gender-based violence, seeming to link violence against women to Islam.

The order will ban all visitors from Syria, Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen for 30 days.

"I would support vetting and stopping people from coming in who are found to be of a terrorist or fanatical or extremist background," Kassab said.

Kassab said that religious minority groups like Chaldeans (Iraqi Catholics) in places like Iraq are often victims of terrorism and so would be more likely not to support terrorism.

"Everybody should be vetted, from every religion, ethnicity, everybody," Kassab said. "But the vetting for the minorities who are victims of terrorism and fanaticism might be easier than others."

Is Detroit a "sanctuary city" and how will it respond to Trump's executive order on immigration and sanctuary cities?

Here's the full response from Alexis Wiley, the chief of staff to Detroit Mayor Mike Duggan:

"The President's Executive Order does not affect any policy or practice in the City of Detroit.

Detroit is a Welcoming City to people from all countries. The recent launch of the Detroit Municipal ID, our commitment to hiring bilingual city employees, the City Council's Immigration Task Force, and the administration's hiring of the City's first full-time Director of Immigrant Affairs were all initiatives done in the last three years in support of that commitment.

As far as the executive order itself, it will have no effect on any operation of the City of Detroit. The Detroit Police Department has always cooperated with federal customs and immigration officials on law enforcement. A decade ago, the Detroit City Council passed an ordinance which banned the practice of improper profiling, which it labeled a "Sanctuary City Ordinance". The Detroit City ordinance does not contain any of the provisions to which the President's Executive Order are directed.

If the definition of a Sanctuary City is one in which people are not profiled because of their appearance, Detroit is a Sanctuary City.

If the definition of a Sanctuary City is one in which local law enforcement refuses to cooperate with federal customs and immigration officials, Detroit is not a Sanctuary City.

Whatever label is used, Detroit's commitment to making Detroit a Welcoming City to immigrants from around the world remains just as strong and all of Detroit's Welcoming City initiatives will continue."

Attorneys Warn Immigrants Not To Travel Outside The U.S., Thanks To Trump

An executive order may prevent some immigrants legally here from coming back.

By Elise Foley

Huffington Post, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON — Immigration attorney Ally Bolour got a call on Wednesday from a client worried about President Donald Trump's expected executive order that could temporarily shut down travel from majority-Muslim countries.

The client is planning a trip to Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, for his birthday. He lives in the U.S. legally as a green-card holder, but he's from Iran — one of the countries Trump will likely single out for restrictions. The man, Amir, who asked to be identified only by his first name, already paid for his flight and hotel, but asked Bolour for advice.

"If I were you, I wouldn't go," Bolour said he told Amir. "It's too uncertain."

Trump has not yet signed an executive order to keep people from certain countries from coming to the United States. But already, news that he is considering such restrictions is having a dramatic impact. Leaked drafts indicate it could be harder or even impossible for people from seven countries to get into the U.S. — even if they hold green cards.

Immigration attorneys and advocacy groups said they were being inundated with questions from people legally in the U.S. wondering whether it would be safe for them to travel. Some want to leave the country to attend a parent's funeral. Students hoped to travel home for spring break. Couples have plans for a vacation together. All of them, lawyers are advising, should stay put.

"I don't want to make people scared for no reason, but I think caution is best right now until we see what that exact language will be," said Nermeen Arastu, clinical law professor at CUNY School of Law. "If you're a not U.S. citizen, don't leave right now."

Hassan Shibly, executive director of Council on American-Islamic Relations' Florida chapter, said a source in the federal government advised him to tell people that non-citizens who are natives of the countries mentioned in drafts of Trump's executive order should not leave the U.S. for the time being, even if they hold green cards.

"We definitely need people to take caution at this point," Shibly said. "With Trump, you cannot take any risks. You cannot take any principle of liberty or justice for granted. We cannot let our guard down."

The attorneys and experts said they have spent recent days trying to calm immigrants and Muslim communities. Offering advice before Trump signs the order, without knowing the final language, is a particular challenge, they pointed out. They don't know, for example, whether it will apply to green-card holders and what countries will be targeted.

"These orders are going to have an impact on the daily life of hundreds of thousands of individuals in this country who are here through different visa programs," said Abed

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ayoub, legal director at the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee.

Immigration attorney Hassan Ahmad cautioned against blanket statements of advice about whether to leave or stay. The order isn't signed, he said, and many immigration cases are different. Some people may be seeking asylum, for example, in a different situation than someone with a green card.

"There is no easy answer, unfortunately, and that's a really tough pill to swallow," Ahmad said.

Amir is still unsure what to do about his trip. When he planned the vacation, he never imagined he'd have to worry about presidential politics, he said.

Amir, who is gay, came to the U.S. 11 years ago as a student and received asylum based on persecution in Iran over his sexual orientation, he said. He has held a green card for five years and has traveled outside the U.S. multiple times for work and pleasure. He hasn't been back to Iran.

Amir said his whole life is in the U.S.: a job, a house, a partner and friends. He said he'll make up his mind about his vacation after he sees what Trump's executive order actually says, and whether green-card holders already outside the U.S. have trouble returning.

"Let's say I go to Mexico and want to come back and they don't let me in. Where am I going to go?" he asked. "I can't go back to my home country. I don't have any other place to go."

'Over My Dead Body': Tribe Aims To Block Trump's Border Wall On Arizona Land

Controlling 2.8m acres of a reservation, the Tohono O'odham Nation vowed to oppose construction on its land and called for a meeting with the president

By Sam Levin

The Guardian (UK), January 26, 2017

Donald Trump's proposed border wall could face a major obstacle in Arizona, where an indigenous tribe has vowed to oppose construction on its land, paving the way for potential mass resistance following the model of Standing Rock.

The Tohono O'odham Nation, a federally recognized tribe with a reservation that spans 75 miles of the US-Mexico border, announced on Thursday that it does not support the wall and criticized the White House for signing an executive order without consulting the tribe.

The Tohono O'odham's statement calls for a meeting with the president and comes after a tribal vice-chairman declared the government would build the wall "over my dead body". Earlier in his first week in office, Trump also promised to push forward with the the Dakota Access pipeline, which last year attracted an unprecedented gathering of indigenous groups to back the Standing Rock Sioux tribe in its fight against the oil project.

The Tohono O'odham tribe, which has roughly 28,000 members and controls 2.8m acres of a reservation in south-western Arizona, has long struggled with the militarized international border that was drawn through the middle of its traditional lands.

The O'odham people historically inhabited lands that stretched south to Sonora, Mexico, and just north of Phoenix, Arizona, and there are tribe members who still live in Mexico. The tribe today has the second largest Native American land base in the country, and indigenous people say the US Border Patrol has for decades significantly disrupted tribal communities and their day-to-day life.

"It cuts through our ancestral land, and it divides families that have been able to go back and forth freely since before the border line was drawn," said Bradley Moreno, a Tohono O'odham member who grew up miles from the border. "Border Patrol is a way of life for us."

The tribe has said that Border Patrol agents in the past have detained and deported Tohono O'odham people who were "simply traveling through their own traditional lands, practicing migratory traditions essential to their religion, economy and culture".

Moreno, 35, said law enforcement harassment is common for indigenous people and that he has been pulled over and questioned by Border Patrol more than a dozen times.

There is also already a steel barrier at the border along the reservation, and if a wall is built, the results would be disastrous, Moreno added.

"It's going to affect our sacred lands. It's going to affect our ceremonial sites. It's going to affect the environment. We have wildlife, and they have their own patterns of migration," he said. "There are just so many things that are wrong with this. The whole idea behind it is just racist."

Trump launched his campaign with a pledge to build a wall, with a speech that labeled Mexican immigrants "criminals" and "rapists". His executive order on Wednesday, part of a series of anti-immigration announcements, called for the building of a "contiguous, physical wall or other similarly secure, contiguous, and impassable physical barrier".

It's unclear how Congress could attempt to finance construction, and Trump has claimed that Mexico would ultimately be forced to pay the bill. On Thursday, Mexico's president Enrique Peña Nieto canceled a scheduled visit to meet with Trump after repeatedly stating that his nation would not fund for a wall.

Although Trump campaigned on addressing a border "crisis", experts have disputed the effectiveness of constructing a wall, noting research showing there is no link between immigration and crime.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Trump would face numerous legal hurdles if he attempted to build a wall on Tohono O'odham land, which functions under law as an autonomous government.

"He is going to have a very serious and prolonged battle with the O'odham people," said Raul Grijalva, a Democratic congressman from Arizona. "They know what's at stake is their sovereignty."

The tribe, which did not respond to interview requests on Thursday, said in its statement it would oppose a "large scale fortified wall".

Indigenous activists vowed to aggressively fight the wall if it reaches tribal land in Arizona, and Moreno said people were already discussing strategies for "direct action".

Audra Antone, who lives in the state's Gila River Indian Community and whose family is O'odham, said if the government moved to start construction, large protests like Standing Rock could emerge.

"It's divide and conquer again. We need to stand our ground as Native American people," said Antone, noting that her son's father was deported to Mexico. "We're going backward if we do not stand up and fight."

Trump: No Muslim Ban, Just Immigration Restrictions

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 26, 2017

President Trump denies he is about to authorize a "ban" on Muslim migration, only restrictions on entry from countries with a history of terrorism.

"It's countries that have tremendous terror," Trump told ABC News in his first television interview as president. "And it's countries that people are going to come in and cause us tremendous problems."

The Trump team is poised to suspend refugee and visa programs as applied to many Muslim countries in the Middle East, including war-torn Syria, with details still being determined..

White House spokesman Sean Spicer said there is no set date for issuance of new rules because the "nature of them has not been decided yet."

Critics of the imminent orders said they will block law-abiding Muslims trying to escape the very kind of violence Trump is talking about.

Rabbi Jack Moline, president of the Interfaith Alliance, called it a "de facto" ban on Muslims.

"The United States has long prided itself as a safe bastion for refugees around the globe facing persecution and strife," Moline said. "President Trump is poised to trample upon that great legacy in one of his first major acts in office."

Trump told ABC News his target is the Islamic State and other extremist groups: "You're looking at people that come in, in many cases, in some cases with evil intentions. I don't want that."

Some people could get in, Trump suggested, but only after what he called "extreme vetting."

"We're going to have extreme vetting in all cases," he told ABC. "And I mean extreme."

Trump's Order To Ban Refugees And Immigrants Triggers Fears Across The Globe

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Louisa Loveluck And Kevin Sieff

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

CAIRO — President Trump's executive order to tighten the vetting of potential immigrants and visitors to the United States, as well as to ban some refugees seeking to resettle in the country, will shatter countless dreams and divide families, would-be immigrants and human rights activists warned.

The draft order, expected to be signed as early as Thursday, calls for the immediate cessation of ongoing resettlement of Syrian refugees in the United States, rejecting visas for visitors and immigrant hopefuls based partly on their ideology and opinions.

A copy of the draft orders was leaked Wednesday to civil rights groups and obtained by The Washington Post.

"I feel devastated," said Ibrahim Abu Ghanem, 37, a father of three in the Yemeni capital, Sanaa, whose father and two brothers live in the United States. "This means all my plans are going to go down the drain."

If the order is enacted, among those immediately affected would be potential immigrants and visitors from seven Muslim countries — Yemen, Iraq, Syria, Somalia, Iran, Libya and Sudan — that are considered by the Trump administration as nations whose citizens "would be detrimental to the interests of the United States." For the next 30 days, they will not be allowed entry into the United States, even if they have visas and relatives who are U.S. citizens.

The order also calls for halting all admission and resettlement of refugees for 120 days pending the review of vetting procedures. For Syrian refugees, the ban will remain in place until further notice.

Once restarted, annual refugee admissions from all nations would be halved, from a current level of 100,000 to 50,000.

For those affected, the fear is that the order will be a harbinger for even greater restrictions on the horizon for Muslim immigrants, refugees and visitors — fulfilling Trump's campaign promises of "extreme vetting" of foreigners seeking entry into the United States and installing "a Muslim ban." Somalia, Syria, Iraq and Iran are among the leading countries of origin of recent refugees to the United States.

"It's going to be devastating," said Denise Bell, senior campaigner for refugee and migrant rights for the watchdog group Amnesty International. “Refugees are not a threat. They are the ones fleeing horrific violence. They are trying to rebuild their lives. They want the same safety and opportunities that any of us would want.”

“And so we are scapegoating them in the guise of national security. Instead, we are betraying our own values. We are violating international law,” she said.

Since Wednesday, as news of the impending order spread, lives were quickly affected across the world, particularly among the citizens of the countries immediately targeted. For them, it’s already difficult to get visas or immigrate to the United States. Vetting has been stringent since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, say human rights activists. Even so, many potential Muslim immigrants went through long screening processes, often lasting years, to gain entry to the United States. Now, many find themselves in an emotional and bureaucratic limbo.

In Sanaa, Ghanem had been making plans to travel with his family to Cairo to apply for visas at the U.S. Embassy in the Egyptian capital. His mother and younger brother are also in Yemen. He wanted to reunite his family.

“My wife and I have spent countless nights dreaming of a better future for us and especially our children,” said Ghanem, a former administrator at a center for battling cancer. “We were hoping for a better life, better opportunities and good education for our children.”

The shock for Syrian refugees already in the United States cut deepest for those awaiting the arrival of loved ones.

For Eman, a widow in Chicago who asked that her surname be withheld out of concern for family back home, that means her son. They fled the western Syrian city of Homs in 2012, fearing he would be conscripted into President Bashar al-Assad’s military. Months after her own arrival in America, Eman had expected her eldest to arrive in short order, once paperwork for his new marriage was approved.

“It seemed like everything was fine and he was finally going to join me here. Now they tell me it might be impossible because of the president’s new decree,” she said. “I’m so scared. I came to America because I thought it would be best for my family.”

Syria’s bitter war has created the largest refugee crisis since World War II. Jordan, Turkey and Lebanon have absorbed more than 4 million displaced Syrians, spread across camps or living on meager resources in cramped apartments. In comparison, the United States accepted less than 13,000 Syrian immigrants last year, a figure that only rose in the final months after tight vetting procedures initially stemmed the monthly flow to the low hundreds.

“We have to remember these people are escaping the very same terrorism that Trump says he’s banning them for,” said Suzanne Akhras Sahloul, founder of the Syrian Community Network, a grass-roots initiative that has stepped in to fill the linguistic and cultural gaps that larger relief agencies are unable to address.

Refugee advocates say the resettlement of Syrians presents challenges unusual in the United States, even among new refugees. Doctors in Chicago discovered that some Syrians still carried shrapnel in their bodies. Less visible but more pervasive is the trauma. Many have been tortured or lived amid constant bombardment.

In Iraq, where Iraqi military personnel are fighting against the Islamic State alongside U.S. Special Operations forces, the visa ban was considered an insult.

“They trained me to fight terrorism, and they look at me as a terrorist?” said one F-16 pilot who trained in the United States for five years and declined to be named because he did not have his superiors’ permission to speak to reporters. “It’s true that they have the right to protect their country, but that doesn’t mean they should treat us like we are germs.”

He said he has no desire to live in the United States, but that he would like to visit again and “relax” after “fighting terrorism on their behalf.”

“If they really do ban us, it means we are of no value to them,” he said. “They are just using us.”

Ammar Karim, 37, an Iraqi correspondent with Agence France-Presse, is in the final steps of a program to resettle in the United States. He applied four years ago, and his sponsor in Seattle was recently informed to prepare for his arrival. Karim was one of the first interpreters to work with U.S. Marines in Baghdad following the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. He has also worked for large American news organizations, making him a target of militants.

On Thursday, Karim did not hide his disappointment and anger.

“Now, because of this new decision, I feel there is no hope that I will move to the U.S.,” he said. “I will have to stay in this country that is still not at peace. The people who will be affected by this ban are those who did the best for America in Iraq. They sacrificed their lives.”

He added: “It’s not fair. This president doesn’t understand our situation. The U.S. is abandoning the people who stood behind them.”

For Iran and Iranian Americans, the new restrictions are expected to hit particularly hard. Of the roughly 1 million Iranian Americans living in the United States, the vast majority still have family members in Iran. Those relatives, who fall under the new executive order banning citizens from certain countries, would be prohibited from visiting loved ones in the United States. Students, artists, filmmakers and even Europeans who also hold Iranian passports could be denied entry.

Under the executive order, governments are required to provide U.S. agencies with information confirming that any applicants are not a security threat. But because the United States and Iran do not have diplomatic ties — and have a history of tense relations — Iranian officials are unlikely to comply.

Even if they did, "we are skeptical . . . the Trump administration would accept such efforts," NIAC Action, the sister organization of the National Iranian American Council, said in a statement Wednesday. "This would, in effect, mean a permanent ban on entry for Iranians," the advocacy group said, adding that even Iranian green-card holders currently outside the United States could be barred from reentry.

In the world's largest refugee camp, called Dadaab, near the Kenya-Somalia border, news of Trump's impending announcement spread quickly.

"You could see the sadness on people's faces," said Mohammed Rashid, an English teacher who has been waiting for five years for his asylum case to be approved.

Between 2001 and 2015, the United States admitted more than 90,000 Somali refugees, according to the U.S. Office of Refugee Resettlement. Many of them came from Dadaab, where generations of Somalis first fled civil war and then fled Islamic extremist groups, often applying for asylum in the United States after arriving at the camp.

Rashid fled Somalia for Dadaab in 1992 to save his family from the country's civil war. "We thought our children would have better lives in the U.S.," said Rashid. "Now, with Trump, we are disappointed. There is nowhere else for us to go."

Rashid sat for an interview with American resettlement officials in Kenya in 2015. His fingerprints were taken, but while waiting for his asylum to be approved, he and his wife had a third child, which he said delayed their approval.

After the election, he started following several Trump-related accounts on Twitter to keep abreast of American news. His brother was resettled in Seattle several years earlier, and Rashid already felt an attachment to the United States. In November, when a Somali-born student at Ohio State University injured 11 people in an attack, Rashid read Trump's tweet that the attacker was a "Somali refugee who should not have been in our country."

On Wednesday, Rashid saw a tweet that said Somali refugees would be banned from the United States. He said he tried not to cry. "The refugees are people who ran away; they are victims," he said. "I don't know why we are being targeted."

In Sudan, some were surprised to see their country on the list of affected countries. Earlier this month, the Obama administration relaxed long-standing sanctions on the country, and it appeared that relations between the nations were warming. As part of the agreement to lift sanctions, Sudanese officials pledged to increase cooperation on combating terrorism.

In 2001, the United States accepted more than 4,000 "Lost Boys" from Sudan, whose families were killed or vanished during the country's civil war. Their stories were broadcast in dozens of books, movies and television reports. Some of them went on to careers as professional athletes, diplomats and renowned writers.

The United States later resettled a large number of refugees fleeing conflict in Sudan's Darfur region, where 3.3 million people are still in need of humanitarian assistance, according to the United Nations.

Some Sudanese refugees in Cairo have spent years in Egypt seeking resettlement to the United States and Europe. Now, there is even less hope.

"I have been trying for four years, but all is in vain," said Maher Ismail, 23, a university student. "Our conditions here are dire. It is very difficult to get anywhere, the U.S. or any other place. I have applied for a lottery visa three months ago anyway, but I know how this is going to end up."

Ghanem said he believes that the attitude toward Muslim immigrants and visitors will only worsen in the United States and that he is afraid his family will never be reunited.

"This decision has really destroyed our dreams," he said. "I don't know what I will say to my mother or how I would break the news for her."

Star Of Iranian Film Says She Will Boycott Oscars Over Trump's Visa Ban

By Rachel Donadio

New York Times, January 26, 2017

PARIS — The Iranian actress Taraneh Alidoosti, a co-star of "The Salesman," an Iranian film up for the foreign-language Academy Award, said Thursday that she would boycott the Oscars ceremony to protest President Trump's announcement that he would issue a temporary ban on visas to citizens from seven predominantly Muslim countries.

Mr. Trump said this week that he would issue an executive order to suspend immigration for at least 30 days for citizens of Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria and Yemen. It remains unclear how and whether the ban would take effect.

Ms. Alidoosti made her intentions clear on her Twitter feed, writing: "Trump's visa ban for Iranians is racist. Whether this will include a cultural event or not, I won't attend the #AcademyAwards 2017 in protest."

In an email interview, she said that she would not attend the Oscars ceremony on Feb. 26 even if it turned out the proposed ban did not affect her ability to get a visa.

"I decided not to go even if I could, because it hurts me deeply to see ordinary people of my country being rejected for what might be their legal right to have access to their children abroad or to their school classes as students," Ms. Alidoosti said.

"The Salesman," which the government of Iran approved for submission to the Academy Awards, is one of five films vying for best foreign language film. It is directed by Asghar Farhadi, whose "A Separation" won an Oscar for best foreign language film in 2012.

"The Salesman" tells the story of a Tehran couple whose lives are irrevocably changed when they have to move apartments while starring in an amateur production of Arthur Miller's "The Death of a Salesman."

Ms. Alidoosti said she had not discussed her decision with Mr. Farhadi and did not know who would represent the film at the ceremony. She said that the director had generally brought the lead actors of his films to foreign awards ceremonies, including to the Cannes Film Festival, where "The Salesman" received a strong critical reception last year.

The actress noted that the United States did not have an embassy in Tehran and that Iranians often traveled to neighboring countries to secure visas. "Many people have urgent medical cases," she said. "I'm sure all of them are not just going through the ordeal for a fun vacation; they might have a more serious case."

"I'm sure the United States has also benefited many times from Iranian immigrants and people who have worked there and served that country," Ms. Alidoosti added. "So it's not acceptable to me to respect a state that does not respect the people of my country."

A spokeswoman for the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Madeleine Albright: 'I Stand Ready To Register As A Muslim'

By Sean Rossman

Former U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright — citing her varied religious background — said in a Wednesday tweet she's ready to register as a Muslim.

Albright, the first woman to run the State Department under former President Bill Clinton, joined thousands of people who have pledged to register as a Muslim. It's a push back against Trump's support of a Muslim registry on the campaign trail. The president's chief of staff Reince Priebus has since said Trump has no plans for a Muslim registry.

The website www.registerus.today has collected more than 30,000 pledges from people who said they'll register as a Muslim in order to support the faith.

"We pledge to stand together with Muslims across the country, and around the world," the website reads. "Because when we stand as one, no American can be singled out by their race, religion, income, gender identity, or sexual orientation."

Albright also tweeted her support for refugees, saying in a tweet, "There is no fine print on the Statue of Liberty. America must remain open to people of all faiths & backgrounds. #RefugeesWelcome."

The tweet comes amid news Trump is poised to suspend America's refugee program, which would halt the flow of people to the U.S. escaping religious, political and ethnic persecution

The U.S. Already Tried 'extreme Vetting' For Muslims. It Didn't Work.

By Aslı Ü. Bâli

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

President Trump is reportedly poised to signed an executive order to begin "extreme vetting" of immigrants and visitors to the United States. Though falling short of his infamous campaign promise of "a total and complete shutdown on Muslims entering the United States," reports suggest that this shutdown will include a ban on visas to the United States from several Muslim-majority countries and language that appears to uniquely target Muslims.

This would not be the first time the United States has sought to restrict entry by Muslim foreigners. A recently discontinued Bush-era registration program, the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System (NSEERS), did much the same thing. Its failure to achieve its avowed goals has important lessons for Trump's new plan.

NSEERS effectively created a registry for some Muslims, while remaining under the radar for most Americans. Male noncitizens over the age of 16 traveling to or present in the United States from 24 Arab- or Muslim-majority countries (plus North Korea) were registered. These men were required to enter the United States at designated airports — rather than those closest to their destination — to be fingerprinted, photographed and interrogated. They were also required to check in with immigration officials at regular intervals and depart only from designated airports.

For individuals already in the country, the consequences of NSEERS were severe. Men originally from the designated countries — except green-card holders or U.S. citizens — were required to report for questioning before immigration officials. This "call-in registration" or "Special Registration" sowed chaos among immigrant communities.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Because the requirements did not exist when their original visas were issued, many weren't even aware that the new registration rules applied to them.

The ensuing confusion, panic and trauma to long-standing immigrant communities was extensive. When the first registration deadline approached in December 2002, more than 400 individuals of Iranian origin in California rushing to comply with the new rules were arrested. In New York, deportations hollowed out parts of the Pakistani immigrant community. Immigration offices were not staffed to administer the program effectively, creating massive delays, with huge lines of people trying to register by published deadlines.

From 2002 to 2003, more than 83,500 men were processed through Special Registration and more than 13,700 were placed into deportation proceedings as a direct consequence of voluntarily complying with the requirements. There were reports of cases of mistaken detentions and removal proceedings. NSEERS was not just a registry. It actually multiplied the grounds for deporting men based on national origin.

The program also proved highly ineffective at its intended counterterrorism goals, yielding not a single terrorism-related prosecution over the decade it remained in place. Law enforcement experts found that the program's broad categorical profiling required vast resources and risked confusing signal and noise.

As a result of sustained opposition and controversies about implementation, aspects of the program were suspended as early as December 2003 when "check in" requirements were dropped. But the requirement that travelers register at ports of entry and depart only from designated airports remained in place for eight more years, making travel from designated countries cumbersome and stressful. Eventually, the introduction of other programs collecting biometric information from all visitors and at all airports rendered NSEERS registration requirements duplicative. On April 28, 2011, the Department of Homeland Security announced that NSEERS had been suspended and the 25 designated countries had been delisted.

While the 2011 DHS announcement ended the application of NSEERS, its regulatory framework remained. After the 2016 election, pressure mounted on the Obama administration to fully rescind the regulations. On Nov. 21, a letter signed by 200 civil rights and interfaith organizations was published calling on the Obama administration to rescind the regulatory framework for NSEERS. Ten days later, more than 50 Democratic members of the House of Representatives sent a letter to President Obama demanding the same.

In December, the Obama administration announced that it would dismantle the dormant program on the grounds "that NSEERS is not only obsolete, but that its use would divert limited personnel and resources from more effective measures." The United States now has an entry-exit system for all foreign visitors, rendering the rationale for introducing an additional registry targeting a subset of visitors from Muslim-majority countries less plausible.

While NSEERS was widely deemed counterproductive in preventing terrorism, it was never found unconstitutional. Attempts to constitutionally challenge the program failed with federal district courts across the country. In 2008, when a challenge reached the 2nd Circuit, that federal appellate court also ruled in favor of the program. Under current constitutional jurisprudence, the federal government's authority over immigration allows for national origin-based discrimination at our borders.

However, Trump's proposals might fare differently. Some of the "extreme vetting questions" listed in a draft proposal by a Trump advisor photographed in November were clearly related to religious belief, with questions about Sharia, jihad and gender equality. The vetting topics listed in the draft Executive Order that was leaked yesterday include a version of these questions without direct reference to Islam. For instance, in the place of jihad the order references "violent religious edicts."

Whereas the Bush administration disavowed religious profiling in its post-9/11 policies, Trump has repeatedly stated his intention to specifically target the Muslim community during the campaign and since the election. The same federal courts that found the NSEERS program constitutional might reach a different conclusion if new programs were shown to be based on religious animus.

Trump Creates Name-and-shame List To Embarrass Sanctuary Cities

By Stephen Dinan

Washington Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump on Wednesday ordered the Homeland Security Department to begin releasing a name-and-shame list of sanctuary cities, listing the specific crimes such as murder or robbery committed by those who have been released back into their communities under the sanctuary policies.

That was one of a number of less-noticed but potentially far-reaching moves tucked inside two new executive orders erasing decades of previous immigration enforcement policy and replacing it with the Trump plan, which calls for aggressive enforcement of existing laws.

Border Patrol and interior enforcement agents have been unshackled from the limits imposed by former President

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Barack Obama, as Mr. Trump said he wants to see them doing the jobs they were hired for.

He said he wants to enlist those local police and sheriff's offices that are eager to enforce immigration law, and will punish those that throw up roadblocks — including the new name-and-shame list.

Some 279 cities and counties refused to cooperate on at least some deportations in 2016, accounting for 2,008 immigrants who were shielded, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Each of those immigrants' convictions will now be publicly listed so residents can see the level of crimes committed by those released into their communities, under the Trump orders.

Analysts said that list could help rally internal opposition to sanctuary cities, which are already rallying to defy Mr. Trump.

"We will fight against attempts to undermine our values and the security of our cities," said the group Cities for Action, a coalition of big municipalities that support sanctuary policies. "As mayors and county executives nationwide have made clear today, we will continue to provide for all in our communities — regardless of where they come from — and work to continue building trust between city residents and law enforcement."

In addition to the shame list, Mr. Trump ordered Homeland Security to produce a list four times a year of all illegal immigrants serving time in federal or state prisons, or being held for trial.

And in another striking move, Mr. Trump ordered Homeland Security officials to begin releasing more information on illegal immigrants. He said the Privacy Act, which has regularly shielded information about illegal immigrants from public disclosure, will no longer apply to anyone who isn't a citizen or green card holder.

That could give the public a new depth of transparency, enabling them to see the types of illegal immigrants the government is encountering.

One part of the new orders would allow Homeland Security to ship illegal immigrants caught crossing the border from Mexico back into Mexico, even as they await the outcome of their deportation cases in the U.S.

That's allowed under existing law, but legal analysts said they'd never heard of it being used, and debated how far it might be used. But immigrant-rights advocates said it could hurt migrants who need protections.

"Given that many of the people crossing the border today are children and families fleeing violence in the Northern Triangle countries of Central America, invoking this provision threatens to undermine our commitment to refugee protections," said Tom Jawetz, vice president for immigration policy at the Center for American Progress.

The Mexican Embassy in Washington did not respond to a request for comment on the provision Wednesday night.

Experts said it's an open question whether Mexico could stymie that part of Mr. Trump's orders by refusing to take back those who crossed over its northern border into the U.S.

Another lesser-noticed provision of the new orders would push Homeland Security to collect fines from both illegal immigrants and "those who facilitate their presence" in the U.S.

That could potentially include sanctuary colleges and universities that protect illegal immigrants, and businesses that hire unauthorized workers.

Current law calls for fines of more than $20,000 per illegal immigrant for companies that are repeat offenders.

Conspiracy to harbor an illegal immigrant carries potential jail time or a fine of up to $10,000.

US Halts Refugee Resettlement Interviews: Report

By Mark Hensch

The Hill, January 26, 2017

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has temporarily suspended refugee interviews overseas, according to a new report.

The DHS's decision to suspend staff trips to conduct the interviews effectively pauses future refugee admissions amid speculation that President Trump may drastically change U.S. refugee policy, Reuters said Thursday.

Reuters said the interviews are a critical step in the often years-long process of resettling people in the U.S.

Two sources with knowledge of the situation confirmed the agency's move to Reuters, with one adding that the DHS told those involved in refugee admissions about the decision Wednesday.

The resettlement interviews are usually one of the last hurdles refugees face before reaching American soil.

Refugees seeking admission also undergo extensive security screening by multiple U.S. agencies, along with vetting from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Reports emerged Wednesday that refugee advocacy groups have obtained a draft of a new order that Trump will sign.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The order would purportedly suspend all refugee admissions into the U.S. for 120 days while the secretary of State reviews refugee application procedures.

Refugees who had previously applied for admission, meanwhile, would have their submissions placed on hold until the secretary of State's review is complete.

The total number of refugees allowed in the U.S., the order adds, will also be reduced in fiscal year 2017 to 50,000, less than half of former President Obama's goal of 110,000.

Trump has repeatedly called for "extreme vetting" of those entering the U.S. from countries linked with terrorism, regardless of whether they're refugees.

Wednesday's draft order states Trump will temporarily suspend the entry of foreign nationals from some Muslim-majority countries upon implementation.

The countries listed include Iraq, Iran, Libya, Somalia, Sudan and Syria, with entry from each suspended for 30 days after the order is issued.

DHS Temporarily Halts Overseas Refugee Interviews

By Mary Kay Mallonee

CNN, January 26, 2017

Washington (CNN)The Department of Homeland Security is putting a temporary freeze on staff trips to other countries to interview refugees who want to come to the US, according to a law enforcement source.

The action, first reported by Reuters, comes as the agency awaits direction from President Donald Trump, who has made clear he plans on making significant changes to the refugee policy.

Halting these overseas interviews until further notice means the admissions process will remain in limbo as refugees await their interview with DHS staff.

"While US Citizenship and Immigration Services has delayed a number of upcoming trips, those trips have not been officially canceled," Gillian M. Christensen, a spokeswoman for the DHS, said in a statement.

Trump is considering a blanket ban on refugees for up to four months, according to a draft executive order obtained by CNN, in keeping with a campaign promise to enact stringent measures on Muslim migrants trying to enter the US.

The order, if enacted, would put in place tough new vetting measures in an attempt to bar potential terrorists from entering the country. Sources familiar with the order said Wednesday that Trump could sign it as early as Friday, but cautioned the language was not yet final.

Advocate Of Ending U.S. Birthright Citizenship May Be Joining Trump Administration

By Spencer S. Hsu

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

A prominent advocate of ending U.S. birthright citizenship is in line to join the Trump administration in an immigration-related position at the Department of Homeland Security, according to two former U.S. officials informed of transition changes by department personnel.

Jon D. Feere has been a legal policy analyst for the Center for Immigration Studies, a conservative group that calls for added immigration restrictions.

Reached Tuesday by a Washington Post reporter, Feere said, "I'm in between jobs. That's all I can say right now. I can't confirm anything," about accounts circulating among some current and former DHS officials that he would join the department in an immigration enforcement post.

Feere, 37, testified before the House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration in 2015 and has written several opinion pieces, including an August 2015 article in TheHill.com, proposing alternatives to a constitutional amendment by which Congress could enact a law or President Trump could issue an executive order denying citizenship, U.S. passports or Social Security numbers to American-born children of people in the country illegally.

Feere in 2010 estimated those births at between 300,000 and 400,000 a year, according to information on the CIS website. Other estimates put the figure lower. About 275,000 babies were born to unauthorized-immigrant parents in 2014, according to Pew Research Center estimates based on government data.

"President Obama has demonstrated that unilateral action by the executive branch is a legitimate means of changing the nation's immigration policy," Feere wrote in his 2015 article. "Though his actions have been controversial, executive actions that direct agencies how to approach birthright citizenship are arguably more justifiable."

Feere added, "Whether Trump worked with Congress to draft legislation or simply directed agencies to apply the Citizenship Clause more narrowly, the issue would likely end up at the Supreme Court."

Feere's name surfaced as GOP congressional judiciary committee staffers were said by former officials to be in the running for other homeland security positions. Those under consideration reportedly include Tracy L. Short, a House panel counsel who formerly served as deputy chief counsel with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's Atlanta office, and Gene P. Hamilton, a Senate panel counsel for

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), Trump's pick for attorney general.

Spokeswomen for Sessions and the House committee did not return requests for comment Wednesday, and Short and Hamilton did not respond to email messages seeking comment.

The administration's potential staffing moves come under a spotlight as Trump began signing executive orders Wednesday on immigration matters including enabling construction of his proposed wall on the U.S.-Mexico border.

Sessions has been an advocate of a tougher crackdown on immigration, although it remained unclear what steps Trump may undertake regarding the Obama administration's Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, known as DACA. The 2012 initiative has given temporary protection from deportation to hundreds of thousands of people who arrived in the United States as children. Trump vowed during the campaign to reverse it.

Denying citizenship to U.S. born children of illegal immigrants would open a new battleground.

"If there is a policy tug of war between the [Trump chief strategist Stephen K.] Bannon faction and the [chief of staff Reince] Priebus faction … assuming those things even exist, there's still lots of hawkish people likely to be appointed in the various agencies," said Mark Krikorian, CIS executive director. Krikorian declined to comment about Feere.

"Personnel is policy, and the people getting the important policy positions in places like ICE, and Customs and Border Protection are likely to be pretty strong pro-enforcement people, as opposed to Bush administration leftovers," Krikorian said.

Feere and other critics of birthright citizenship have argued government action is needed due to the numbers of such children, and what they say is a rise of "birth tourism" and a phenomenon of "chain migration" in which U.S. citizens can sponsor immediate family members to come into the country.

When Congress considered legislation in 1995 to end automatic citizenship for children born to people who entered the U.S. illegally, opponents said it would contradict U.S. constitutional history and tradition and said the 14th Amendment established a "bright-line" principle that being born on American soil makes one a U.S. citizen.

The amendment was passed in response to the 1856 Dred Scott decision by the U.S. Supreme Court that found that no person of African descent could ever become a citizen, and was upheld in 1898 by the court in a challenge to the Chinese Exclusion Act, which prohibited anyone of Chinese ancestry from remaining in the country.

Defending the principle in an NPR interview in 2010, former assistant attorney general and acting solicitor general Walter Dellinger traced it to America's racial history and immigrant identity.

"We believe on a clean slate principle" and that "whatever questions there are about the legitimacy of parents or grandparents, in our country, you get a clean slate," Dellinger said. "Every new child who is born here is simply and indisputably an American. And that is part of our almost unique national identity."

IG Probing Alleged DHS Snooping In Georgia Election Network

By Jennifer G. Hickey

Fox News, January 26, 2017

A government watchdog agency is investigating allegations that Department of Homeland Security officials improperly attempted to breach the Georgia secretary of state's internal elections network last year.

In a Jan. 17 letter to Georgia Secretary of State Brian Kemp, DHS Inspector General John Roth said his office was probing "a series of ten alleged scanning events of the Georgia Secretary of State's network" that may have originated from DHS-affiliated IP addresses.

DHS IG spokeswoman Erica Paulson confirmed the office has launched an investigation.

Georgia officials first went public with their allegations in December. According to a Dec. 8 letter from Kemp to then-Secretary Jeh Johnson, the state's third-party cybersecurity provider detected a "large unblocked scan event" on the morning of Nov. 15, several days after the election.

The alleged effort to penetrate the secretary of state's firewall was traced back to an IP address at DHS' Southwest D.C. office – and did not succeed in breaking through.

But DHS has argued that what Georgia detected was simply a contractor performing routine duties.

After a preliminary review of the incident, Johnson told Kemp that the workstation involved was used by a contractor with the Georgia-based Federal Law Enforcement Training Center (FLETC).

"We interviewed the contractor and he told us that he accessed your website as part of his normal job duties," said Johnson in a Dec. 12 response, in which he also denied that IP address was ever used to conduct security scans.

Johnson also said the contractor was not a member of DHS cybersecurity team and was only trying to determine whether contractors and new employees had certain professional licenses.

Unsatisfied by the explanation, Kemp, a member of DHS' federal election security task force, reached out to President Trump before he took office to request an IG probe into the Nov. 15 activity and nine other apparent attempts dating back to February 2016.

"Could it be normal web traffic that triggered a red flag? Sure, but when you look at the dates there are some interesting correlations between my calendar and when the contacts were made," Kemp told Fox News.

The nine other alleged incidents flagged by Kemp correspond to key election dates and times when Kemp was speaking out against DHS' plans to designate elections systems as "critical infrastructure."

The DHS officially classified the election system as "critical infrastructure" in early January. The move was not welcomed by many secretaries of state.

The designation is "legally and historically unprecedented" and raises "many questions and concerns for states and localities with authority over the administration of our voting process," the National Association of Secretaries of State said in a statement.

It's unclear whether the current IG probe, first reported by The Daily Caller, is being conducted at Trump's behest.

House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Jason Chaffetz, R-Utah, similarly asked the DHS inspector general to launch an inquiry. He further requested the department provide to his committee all of Johnson's correspondence with Kemp.

Chaffetz argued the intrusions, if true, "implicate state sovereignty laws" and constitutional laws.

According to Kemp, the IP address affiliated with the contractor was tied to scans of systems in Kentucky, West Virginia and Maine despite DHS' insistence that no authorized or unauthorized scans were conducted by that workstation.

Last September, DHS offered to provide states assistance with election security, including "cyber hygiene" scans designed to find any irregularities or vulnerabilities, but Georgia and several other states declined the offer.

Justice Department Fights Order To Preserve Ex-DHS Officials' Emails

By By Josh Gerstein

Politico, January 26, 2017

The Justice Department is asking a federal judge to reconsider an order requiring four former Department of Homeland Security officials, including ex-Secretary Jeh Johnson, to preserve many of their emails stored on private accounts.

Last week, two days before the inauguration of President Donald Trump, U.S. District Court Judge Randolph Moss ordered that Johnson and three former top DHS officials move messages they stored in online, personal accounts to thumb drives or hard drives for safekeeping.

Moss said he ordered the move out of "an abundance of caution" in connection with a Judicial Watch Freedom of Information Act lawsuit exploring the officials' use of personal email on government computers.

Justice Department lawyers opposed the preservation order, saying the officials already pledged to hang on to any potentially responsive emails in their accounts. On Thursday, federal government attorneys went back to Moss, asking him to reconsider the order.

The Justice Department attorneys said Moss "erred" when he said copying the officials' emails onto thumb drives wouldn't impact their privacy because they would be allowed to retain the drives.

"Although the Order has the individuals copying their e-mails onto thumb drives and maintaining those thumb drives, the mere existence of a second copy increases the risk that they will be exposed," government lawyers wrote in a motion filed Thursday.

The government also contends that the ex-officials don't know how to copy their messages.

"DHS's present understanding is that the former officials are not independently aware of how to transfer e-mails from a web-based account (i.e., Gmail) to a thumb drive and that DHS information technology staff who were consulted did not have any particular knowledge about how to transfer the e-mails, either," Justice Department attorneys wrote.

The filing suggests the ex-officials and DHS staff are also unsure about how to copy part of the private emails archives, since the suit sought only work-related emails between certain dates in 2013 and 2015.

If Moss won't lift his order, the Justice Department asked that he let the officials move the messages to encrypted DVDs instead of thumb drives or hard drives.

In arguing for the preservation order, Judicial Watch warned that failing to secure the emails before the end of the Obama administration risked repeating the ungainly effort to recover Hillary Clinton's emails after she left government in 2013. However, most of the officials involved had already quit by the time the issue reached judges in recent weeks.

The conservative watchdog group also won a similar order from another judge last week requiring a departing Justice Department official to preserve some of his private-account emails, if any contain potential federal records. Another group, the Competitive Enterprise Institute, obtained an order last month requiring the preservation of private-account emails belonging to a top White House science official.

Justice's filing Thursday was submitted under the name of Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division Joyce Branda. The Trump administration has yet to nominate a lawyer to head Justice's Civil Division.

Moss is an appointee of President Barack Obama.

IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS ENFORCEMENT

Accused Colombian Drug Lord Says He Was Secretly Working For The Feds

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, January 26, 2017

When an elusive cocaine-trafficking suspect was finally extradited to Miami in November, federal prosecutors portrayed Henry De Jesus Lopez Londoño as one of Colombia's most "prolific drug dealers."

But what U.S. authorities did not mention was that Lopez Londoño had been recruited as a confidential informant — or "deep cover mole" —for two federal agencies, his lawyers say in court documents unsealed Thursday.

The defense depicts Lopez Londoño as a coveted government operative who made a deal with the feds and put his life on the line to help the war on drugs — including infiltrating a dangerous drug-trafficking cartel headed by Mexican kingpin Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, as well as paramilitary groups and members of the al-Qaida terrorist network in Colombia.

Saying he was promised "favorable treatment" by agents, Lopez Londoño's attorneys contend he provided them with inside information on the organizations, production plants, drug routes and cocaine shipments and claim his tips led to at least two major U.S. seizures. Although he is known in the trafficking underworld as "Mi Sangre" (My Blood), the court filings say, agents called him by his code name, "Assis."

The filings from his defense team, which had been out of public view until now, claim Lopez Londoño worked formally for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Drug Enforcement Administration as an undercover informant — for a period that covers most of the time he is accused of importing loads of cocaine into the United States.

The U.S. attorney's office in Miami confirmed that Lopez Londoño was once a "confidential source" for one agency, ICE, between August 2010 and February 2011, in a response also unsealed Thursday. But prosecutors said the DEA "never" formally used him as an informant. Prosecutors also dispute that he helped the feds throughout the time frame of his narco-trafficking indictment.

Lopez Londoño, charged with a half-dozen others on a single conspiracy charge of importing and distributing more than five kilos of cocaine between October 2006 and February 2012, is scheduled for trial in late October of this year. Four of his co-conspirators have already pleaded guilty and are cooperating as witnesses.

His lawyers say he signed agreements with ICE and then the DEA during meetings in Cartagena, Colombia, in 2009 and 2010. The agencies, according to court documents, also promised to provide his family with possible asylum in America — along with "favorable treatment for him once he came to the United States."

As a result of Lopez Londoño's "arrangement with ICE, he undertook infiltration assignments among Colombia's paramilitary organizations, at great personal risk, in order to uncover money laundering, drug and weapons trafficking activities in Colombia during the relevant periods of [his] indictment," his lawyers assert in court documents.

Lopez Londoño's lawyers have taken the strategic step of disclosing his once-secret role for the federal agencies in an effort to thwart his prosecution under a rare legal strategy known as the public authority defense. His lead defense attorney, Arturo V. Hernandez, argues in court papers that during the time his client is accused of breaking U.S. drug-trafficking laws, he was merely carrying out his assignments for government agents and therefore cannot be punished for any alleged misconduct.

Hernandez, who is seeking more government evidence about his client as well as federal grand jury minutes, asserts the indictment is "defective" and that the initial U.S. prosecutor on the case deliberately withheld the defendant's role as a government informant from that jury.

Asked about his client's disclosure on Thursday, Hernandez declined to comment, stating he "would litigate this case through the filed pleadings, not in the press."

An Argentine lawyer, who represented Lopez-Londoño in his fight against extradition to the United States, also criticized U.S. authorities for withholding information about his client's role as an informant for federal drug investigators. The defendant was arrested in Argentina in 2012.

"For four years, Mr. Lopez-Londoño fought the U.S. extradition request and the U.S. Government never once informed the Argentine judicial authorities that the defendant had, for a significant period of time, worked for the U.S. Government," attorney Daniel Fedel said in a statement. "Had this been confirmed, Mr. Lopez-Londoño would not have been extradited to the U.S."

According to his lawyers, Lopez-Londoño had fled from Colombia to Argentina in 2008 and would soon start working undercover for a series of federal agencies, requiring him to return to his homeland to infiltrate drug organizations.

They said he returned to Colombia a couple of months before he was indicted by a federal grand jury in February 2012, saying he feared for his life in his native country – not because of the conspiracy case in Miami. Prosecutors, however, said he absconded to Argentina after the indictment was filed in federal court.

Lopez-Londoño was a leader of the right-wing Colombian paramilitary group known as the AUC more than a decade ago, according to prosecutors. He later became a boss of the Urabeños gang in northern Colombia.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

When police in Argentina arrested him in 2012, they said Lopez Londoño held passports from seven countries to evade capture, and that he had entered the country with a false passport while posing as a Venezuelan businessman. He sought asylum, but his petition was rejected, and after a fierce legal fight he was extradited to the U.S. four years later.

In his Miami case, Lopez Londoño filed an affidavit in which he said he first made contact with a U.S. agency in 2008 through a member of AUC. Agents with the Treasury Department, he said, wanted him to help investigate large drug trafficking and money laundering organizations in Colombia. He said the following year, he began his infiltration activities.

In 2009, he said he formalized his undercover work in meetings with agents from another U.S. agency, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, in Cartegena. "I became a documented informant for the U.S. law enforcement agents, and signed two separate contracts," he said in his affidavit unsealed on Thursday.

Lopez Londoño said during that period, he worked with five ICE agents and later with three DEA agents, while infiltrating and providing information on several targets – including the Guzman, Ubarbeños and Los Rastrojos organizations.

As a confidential informant, Lopez Londoño said he provided "extensive intelligence" on the structure of the organizations, cocaine production facilities, drug-trafficking routes, money-laundering activities, and the identities of high-ranking officials "engaged in political corruption" in Colombia, Venezuela and Argentina.

In addition, he said, "I have provided information that has led to at least two seizures of large quantities of cocaine."

Lopez Londoño said he also became aware in 2010 of an "internal conflict" between ICE and the DEA agents over who would be supervising his activities as a confidential informant. He said ICE agents told him to stop working with the DEA.

"Due to the close partnership of DEA with the Colombian police, I had ongoing concerns that my activities would become known to the Colombian police that I believed were corrupt and in the pay of the large cartels," Lopez Londoño said in the affidavit.

"If my activities on behalf of U.S. law enforcement had been leaked to the criminal cartels I was infiltrating," he said, "it would have cost me my life and possibly that of my family."

ICE Agent Raided Korean Restaurant In Exchange For Free Food From Rival, Lawsuit Claims

By Samantha Schmidt
Washington Post, January 26, 2017

In July 2013, Department of Homeland Security investigators raided a popular Las Vegas Korean supper club, detaining its employees for intense hours-long interrogations. According to a lawsuit, they were acting under orders of an Immigration and Customs Enforcement special agent, who portrayed it as a place of "prostitution and human trafficking."

Then, with no federal court order or approval from a judge, the ICE special agent forced the restaurant owner's then-fiancee to wear an electronic tracking device on her ankle for six months, claiming he had the legal authority to monitor her for "as long as he liked," a lawsuit by the club's owners alleges.

Authorities never found the owners of the restaurant, Club Yamang, responsible for the crimes. In fact, the lawsuit brought by those owners claims that ICE special agent Joohoon David Lee had been harassing the restaurant owners and employees in exchange for copious amounts of free food and drinks at a rival Las Vegas supper club, Club Sonagi, also popular for its Korean food, music and attractive hostesses. Lee and the owner of Club Sonagi "hatched a plan to drive Club Yamang out of business and into financial ruin" to benefit Club Sonagi, the lawsuit claims.

In return, Lee would allegedly consume expensive whiskey and food at Club Sonagi, generating tabs between $1,000 to $2,500 an evening, without ever having to pay up. The restaurant employees said it was commonly known that Lee would never be presented with a bill; all of his food and drinks were to be "comped."

"It started becoming more and more apparent to us that this thing was sort of shady all around," Paul Padda, a lawyer for the former restaurant owners and employees, said in an interview with The Washington Post.

Then, in May 2015, Lee was indicted in an unrelated bribery case in Los Angeles, pleading guilty months later. The details of the case "corroborated what we had sensed regarding Lee's ulterior motives," Padda said.

The restaurant's co-owners are now suing the federal government, seeking at least $100,000 each in damages for negligence and emotional distress caused by Lee's alleged harassment. The lawsuit, filed this month on behalf of three investors and co-owners and the now-wife of the former owner, comes after a similar lawsuit filed in April on behalf of the restaurant's former owner, Thomas Kim.

"The raid was not supported by legitimate reasons," the lawsuit states. "Instead it was based almost entirely upon SA Lee's representations and appeal to crass racial/ethnic stereotypes of Asian clubs as dens of prostitution and human trafficking, which SA Lee believed other government officials would be susceptible to believing."

On one evening a few weeks before the initial investigation at Club Yamang, Lee got drunk at Club Sonagi and boasted to some of the club's waitresses that he was going to "raid" Club Yamang, the lawsuit alleges. He made no secret of his status as a federal agent while eating at the restaurant.

Thomas Kim and his wife, Aeja Kim, did not learn until more than a year after the initial raid at their business that Lee's investigation was "a complete fabrication," the lawsuit alleged. By then, the damage was done. For months, Lee harassed Thomas, his employees and investors, they alleged. They alleged he placed Aeja Kim into a database that would flag her for questioning in airports — so each time she returned to the United States from a trip to her native South Korea, she would be detained for questioning for hours. "It was very deeply offensive to her," Padda, the lawyer, said. Two of the restaurant co-owners, a married couple, also ran into similar issues with ICE, Padda said.

"You can play on stereotypes to make people believe the worst about someone," Padda said. "It was a storm of all these things occurring."

Lee allegedly went to the apartment building of one of Thomas Kim's female employees and questioned her at length in the lobby of the complex, within earshot of other residents, about prostitution and illicit drug use. He told the woman, a naturalized citizen, that if she didn't cooperate with him she could lose her citizenship.

As a result of the allegations against it, Club Yamang's business took a significant hit. Thomas Kim told the Las Vegas Review Journal that the restaurant lost hundreds of thousands of dollars because of its damaged reputation.

"The word got out among people in the Asian community and potential customers," Padda said. "It was just not a place people wanted to go to."

The Kims became so frustrated by the constant surveillance and "stalking" — and the resulting blow to the business — that they moved to California two years ago, Padda said. Club Yamang is now under new ownership.

Meanwhile, Lee had become a target of the criminal bribery investigation in Los Angeles. In March 2012, Lee, then a special agent in the human trafficking unit of Homeland Security Investigations, interviewed a woman who claimed to be entering the United States to be a sex slave for a Korean businessman.

About a year after, Lee met with the businessman's attorney and told him that if he would pay for his trip, he would fly to Korea and interview the businessman and submit a positive report on his behalf.

A family member of the man traveled to Las Vegas to give Lee $3,000 in cash, according to court papers. One day later, Lee deposited $1,000 in his bank account and bought a plane ticket to Seoul, where his hotel and entertainment were also paid for by the businessman. Lee solicited a second bribe for $100,000 to make the "immigration issues go away." He eventually received about $6,000 to $8,000 in cash.

After returning to the United States, Lee filed an entry into a law enforcement database stating that although the businessman was suspected of human trafficking, the case was closed because of a lack of evidence. But after another agent alerted internal investigators about Lee's interference in another case, his record was investigated and he was charged with bribery

Lee pleaded guilty in December 2015 to one count of bribery. In July, he was sentenced to 10 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Michael W. Fitzgerald, who called the bribery "a very, very grave crime." Lee's former lawyer declined to comment when reached by The Post.

The case, however grave, was not isolated. A recently published review by the New York Times of thousands of court records and internal agency documents showed that over the last 10 years almost 200 employees and contract workers of the Department of Homeland Security have taken nearly $15 million in bribes.

According to the Associated Press, a massive hiring spree at U.S. Customs and Border Protection about a decade ago led the agency to balloon by nearly 8,000 agents in three years to more than 20,000 in 2009. The number of employees arrested for misconduct, such as civil rights violations or off-duty crimes like domestic violence, grew each year between 2007 and 2012, reaching 336, a 44 percent increase. Additionally, more than 100 employees were arrested or charged with corruption during the six-year span, including taking bribes to smuggle drugs or people.

The Kims' case, Padda said, is a "classic tale of abuse of power."

"What it does underscore is the tremendous power that federal agents have," Padda said, "and how one federal agent alone can really wreak havoc in a person's life."

Immigration Agents Attempt Arrest At Mission District Community Center

By Joe Rivano Barros

San Francisco Chronicle, January 26, 2017

Agents with Immigration and Customs Enforcement attempted to arrest two people suspected of being undocumented immigrants in the Mission District on Thursday morning, but left with no arrests made.

"ICE agents arrived to our center at about 9:20 a.m. this morning," said Mario Paz, the executive director of the Good Samaritan Resource Center at 1294 Potrero Ave. The center sits next to 20 units of housing at 1290 Potrero Ave., and Paz said the immigration agents were looking for two people there.

"An agent entered our center with two papers in hand and asked if two individuals lived here," he said. "Our staff responded that this is not a residency, that this is a community center."

The agents then said thank you and stepped outside, going to the apartment complex next door, he said. The property manager was not in, Paz said, and a group of five agents waited for 10 minutes outside the complex before leaving.

Paz said it was no coincidence that the visit occurred the day after President Donald Trump threatened to cut federal funding for sanctuary cities like San Francisco. He said the visit was "sending out a message" to the city.

"Obviously this sort of rattled us, it rattled some of our staff," he said. "For me this is not necessarily a coincidence that this happened the day after the president's announcement…read more here

ICE Agents Appear At Family Center In SF's Mission District

By Joe Fitzgerald Rodriguez

San Francisco Examiner, January 26, 2017

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents seeking an undocumented immigrant visited a home in San Francisco's Mission District on Thursday, but not before first stopping at a building housing a preschool next door by mistake, an agency spokesperson confirmed.

ICE's Bay Area-based Fugitive Operations Teams conducting "routine enforcement activities" went to the Good Samaritan Family Resource Center at 1290 Potrero Ave. in the Mission District at about 9 a.m. Thursday, trying to locate a convicted sex offender sought for deportation. ICE did not specify the nature of the sex offense.

The family resource center where the ICE agents first visited contains a preschool on site, where 30 toddlers and children played feet away from where ICE agents entered the center.

"They had batons, they had walkie talkies, they had police belts and vests on top of their black uniforms. I didn't notice if they had guns," said Jaime Aragon, services coordination manager at Good Samaritan.

ICE spokesperson Virginia Kice said the agents first went to the person's last known address and identified themselves as ICE officers, but were told the correct address was actually next door at the Good Samaritan-owned apartment building.

When the agents went next door, they did not find their target and left without making any arrests. Kice said such operations occur every day throughout the U.S.

"ICE's enforcement actions are targeted and lead driven, focusing on individuals who pose a threat to national security, border security, and public safety," Kice said in a statement.

Still, the incident sparked fear and outrage among immigration advocates in San Francisco

The incident, which former Supervisor David Campos called "unusual," came only a day after President Donald Trump signed two executive orders that — among other actions — called for 10,000 new ICE agents to perform deportations across the country.

Campos, who termed out in November, said he can't remember any ICE raids during his time as supervisor in the Mission District, a historically Latino neighborhood, and only a "couple of cases" where ICE was seeking someone for deportation.

"Trump just declared war on immigrants," Campos said. "This is very unusual."

Visiting a preschool and other sites containing children is prohibited for ICE under a 2011 Department of Homeland Security "sensitive locations" memorandum, save for exceptional circumstances.

A 2011 memorandum from then-Department of Homeland Security Director John Morton wrote that ICE agents "do not occur at nor are focused on sensitive locations such as schools and churches," including preschools.

However, the order is not intended to "categorically prohibit" operations at sensitive locations like schools, according to the memo, and exceptions include enforcement over a national security or terrorism matter; an imminent risk of death, violence or physical harm; the immediate arrest or pursuit of a dangerous felon or terrorist suspect; or imminent risk of destruction of evidence in an ongoing criminal case.

Mayor Ed Lee's spokesperson Deirdre Hussey said the incident Thursday is an example of how The City must continue to protect undocumented immigrants, even under the threat of losing federal funding by upholding its sanctuary city status.

"We encourage people to continue to visit their community based organization and get the services they need," Hussey said. "San Francisco is and will remain a sanctuary city."

Supervisor Hillary Ronen, whose district includes the Mission, echoed that sentiment.

"We don't want people to be unnecessarily afraid," Ronen said, adding that while this was an ICE appearance, "there has not been a raid."

"Take this time to review your rights," she said. A number of workshops for nonprofits and community members to review their immigration rights are scheduled for the next few weeks.

ICE Agents Descend On Mission's Good Samaritan Center : SFist

By Jay Barmann

SFist, January 26, 2017

The immigration crackdown has begun, and some ICE agents, possibly emboldened or directed by the new Trump regime, conducted a rare raid in San Francisco Thursday, descending upon the Good Samaritan Family Resource Center in the Mission. As the Examiner reports, agents say they were seeking an individual for arrest and possible deportation, but they may have had the wrong address and no arrest was made. They were apparently looking for a person who lives in the center's housing complex next door.

As the Ex notes, the Good Samaritan complex includes a preschool, along with a health clinic and adult classrooms where English is taught, among other things, and immigration agents are not supposed to conduct raids at "sensitive locations" like schools, according to a 2011 Department of Homeland Security memorandum, except under exceptional circumstances. The only people at the center at the time of the raid, at 9 a.m., were thirty toddlers and their teachers at the preschool, and 20 Latino families who were just arriving for an ESL class.

In this case, five agents arrived with batons, and neighbors reported on Facebook that they heard a helicopter hovering as well. It remains unclear whom they were seeking, or if they proceeded to attempt an arrest elsewhere.

President Trump on Wednesday, as part of his executive order vowing punishments for Sanctuary Cities like San Francisco, promised to publish a weekly lists of crimes allegedly committed by undocumented immigrants in these cities. It is unclear whether local ICE agents already had some directive to detain one such alleged criminal. (Under the wording of the executive order, as CNN points out, undocumented people could be deported simply for being charged with a crime, even if they have not been convicted.)

The Ex spoke to former Mission District Supervisor David Campos who said he could only recall a "couple of cases" in which ICE went looking someone in the neighborhood for deportation, and no raids that occurred under his tenure as supervisor.

"My initial reaction was, 'Is this a change in policy?'" Campos told the paper. "Trump just declared war on immigrants. This is very unusual."

San Francisco already has provisions for the detention of undocumented criminals, and for turning them over to ICE for deportation if they have a serious felony conviction like murder or rape on their record within the past five years, or if they had a violent or serious felony conviction in the past seven years or three or more lesser felonies arising from different events in the past five years.

ICE Agents Arrive At San Francisco Nonprofit, Rattling Staff; Agents Were Seeking Nearby Sex Offender

By Matt Hamilton, Contact Reporter

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

ICE agents arrived Thursday morning at a San Francisco nonprofit serving mostly low-income Latino immigrant families, rattling staffers and stoking fears about illegal immigration crackdowns under President Trump.

But though agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents did descend on the Good Samaritan Family Resource Center in the Mission District, immigration officials said it was not a raid but a targeted effort to find a convicted sex offender wanted for deportation.

The agents — with "ICE" in large letters on the back of their clothes — arrived about 9:20 a.m. at the center and lingered outside the building, according to Jaime Aragon, the organization's service coordination manager. After a few minutes, they entered and asked Aragon about people who lived there.

"I told them this is a family resource center. No one lives here — I can't help them," said Aragon, who directed the agents to a housing complex next door. The officer "thanked me and left."

Virginia Kice, an ICE spokeswoman, said that after learning the suspect's last address was actually next door, the agents promptly walked out. At the housing complex, the agents didn't find the person and left the area without making an arrest, Kice said.

ICE described the action by agents as routine — part of typical operations to track down specific individuals in the country illegally who pose a threat to public safety or national security.

"ICE deportation officers and special agents conduct operations every day in locations around the country," Kice said in a statement.

An ICE policy memorandum from 2011 calls on officers to avoid conducting actions at "sensitive locations," including schools, hospitals, churches and public demonstrations, and to use extra caution at organizations that help children and pregnant women.

To Aragon, who has worked at the nonprofit for seven years, the presence of federal immigration agents put him on edge.

"Nothing like this ever happened close to home. It was very jarring," Aragon said. "It took us by surprise. We know what to do and we are equipped to respond in an appropriate way, but it was still very disturbing."

The brief presence of ICE agents came just a day after Trump signed two executive orders designed to begin building a wall along the border with Mexico, add lockups for detaining immigrants who cross the border illegally, enhance enforcement powers for border agents and strip federal funding to cities that refuse to cooperate with immigration enforcement.

According to a draft document reviewed by The Times, under the new order, the federal government would threaten to withhold funds from so-called sanctuary cities that limit cooperation with immigration officials. San Francisco, like Los Angeles, is a sanctuary city, a broad policy aimed at welcoming those here illegally.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Staffers at Good Samaritan Family Resource Center hoped that the brief visit by ICE agents does not frighten away those who utilize their services: primarily low-income immigrant families. The organization provides child care, English classes, parenting groups and after-school programs.

Aragon said it was a small relief that the federal agents came at 9:20 a.m. The group has a large wave of English as a second language students who arrive at 9 a.m., usually with their children in tow.

"Everyone missed these officers by a hair," he said.

Border Patrol Chief Resigns After Clashing With Powerful Union

By Jerry Markon, Lisa Rein And Wesley Lowery

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

The chief of the U.S. Border Patrol has resigned after only six months on the job, one day after President Trump announced plans to ratchet up immigration enforcement and build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, officials said Thursday.

It was not immediately clear why Mark Morgan — a career FBI official who was the first outsider to lead the agency responsible for securing the U.S. borders — left the agency. His resignation is effective Jan. 31, officials said.

But Morgan had clashed with the powerful Border Patrol union, which endorsed Trump for president and whose leaders were present at Trump's announcement of his immigration crackdown at Department of Homeland Security headquarters Friday.

Gil Kerlikowske, former commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, which oversees the Border Patrol, said in an interview that the union never supported Morgan for the job and appeared to be behind his departure.

"The union has been very vocal about someone from outside of the Border Patrol becoming the head of the Border Patrol," Kerlikowske said. "The union supported this candidate for president, and now very much appears to be directing things – which is absolutely unheard of in law enforcement. The union used their influence to have him removed."

A few weeks after Trump's election, the conservative website Bretibart.com published an op-ed by the executive board of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents 16,500 agents. The piece was titled, "The chief Obama gave us is a disgrace." It criticized Morgan's leadership of the agency, in part latching onto a statement he made to members of Congress that said he supported "comprehensive immigration reform." The union called this a partisan view.

Union officials and Morgan could not immediately be reached for comment.

Kevin K. McAleenan, acting commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, praised Morgan "for his unwavering dedication to our border security mission" and "his lifelong career in service to the nation." His statement did not explain Morgan's departure.

The Border Patrol will have an important role in enforcing Trump's crackdown on the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants. The president on Wednesday signed executive actions to order the construction of his controversial southwest border wall and cut off funds to cities that do not report undocumented immigrants to federal authorities. Trump also called for thousands of additional Border Patrol agents. There are now about 21,000.

Morgan, 52, started his career as a Los Angeles police officer before ascending the ranks of the FBI. Kerlikowske chose him for the Border Patrol job, overlooking others who came up through the ranks, to change what is considered, even by law enforcement standards, to be an insular culture. Many agents, including the Border Patrol union, opposed the selection at the time, saying an outsider could never gain agents' trust.

Morgan told The Washington Post in an interview last September that his first priority was to change the culture of the agency, which had for years faced allegations of an overly confrontational approach in its enforcement that resulted in multiple fatal shootings of illegal immigrants and a lack of accountability in investigating misconduct.

Morgan said he wanted to solve those problems. " It was a culture of not getting out and talking about the issues, not being transparent about the process and it drove the perception there was a culture problem," he told The Post.

Two years ago, Kerlikowske had brought Morgan over from the FBI to run the internal affairs office at the larger Customs and Border Protection agency after removing the longtime official in the job. That official had been criticized for failing to investigate multiple allegations that Border Patrol agents had used excessive force on migrants. Morgan was then promoted to run the Border Patrol in July.

During his short tenure, Morgan enforced new use-of-force policies in the agency's training academy curriculum that encouraged recruits to turn to other strategies to defuse encounters that could get violent. He was working with agents to help them develop better intelligence on drug cartels and smugglers behind illegal border crossings, and was also seeking to create a system to better review cases in which agents fire their weapons.

Law enforcement officials describe Morgan — who was a career, not political appointee — as a careerist, as opposed to being a political partisan.

"He's not a political guy," said Jim Pasco, executive director the nation Fraternal Order of Police. "I've never heard a bad thing about him – and I work for a union, we hear bad things about everyone."

U.S. Border Patrol Chief Ousted From Job

By Stephen Dinan

Washington Times, January 26, 2017

Border Patrol Chief Mark Morgan will be leaving job, the agency announced Thursday, after just seven months on the job.

His departure comes just a day after President Trump issued a broad set of new directives to Border Patrol agents to step up enforcement of existing laws.

Customs and Border Protection announced the move in a brief statement thanking Chief Morgan for his long government service, including 20 years in the FBI

His last day will be Jan. 31.

Chief Morgan made news last year when he disagreed with the Obama administration's stance on the new illegal immigrant surge, saying lax enforcement policies were enticing more migrants to attempt to breach the border.

He also said he was having to pull his trained agents off their duties to act as "child care providers" for the children being nabbed at the border.

No reason was given for Chief Morgan's departure, but he has tangled with the National Border Patrol Council, the labor union that represents line agents. The NBPC had wanted to see someone promoted from within the ranks, rather than someone from another law enforcement agency put in the leadership post.

The NBPC has become a powerful political force after endorsing Mr. Trump in the presidential election.

AP Source: Border Patrol Chief Says He's Been Forced Out

By Elliot Spagat And Alicia A. Caldwell

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – The man charged with protecting America's borders was ousted Thursday, one day after President Donald Trump announced ambitious plans to build a massive wall at the Mexican border and bolster the ranks of the Border Patrol.

Border Patrol Chief Mark Morgan said he was asked to leave and decided to resign rather than fight the request, according to a U.S. official who was on brief video conference in which Morgan informed senior agents of the change.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the discussion was not intended to be made public.

The forced resignation leaves Trump with a leadership gap but also gives him a chance to start fresh with a Border Patrol chief of his own choosing.

Border security and a "big beautiful wall" paid for by the Mexican government were centerpieces of Trump's immigration platform during his presidential campaign. Mexico has repeatedly said it won't pay for a barrier, and Mexican president Enrique Pena Nieto on Thursday cancelled a meeting with Trump.

Morgan was named to the post in June and took office in October. The former FBI agent briefly led the internal affairs department at the Border Patrol's parent agency before heading the agency of roughly 20,000 agents.

His removal wasn't a surprise. From the start, Morgan clashed with the Border Patrol's union, which had advocated for an insider to lead the agency and sharply criticized Morgan at almost every turn.

The union was incensed when Morgan, at a Senate hearing Dec. 1, said he supported a comprehensive immigration overhaul, which is often interpreted to include a path to citizenship for people who are in the country illegally. Morgan clarified his remarks in a note to Border Patrol staff the following week, saying he does not support a "blanket amnesty."

The union, the National Border Patrol Council, has had a strong relationship with Trump. It was so enamored with his stance on security that it took the unusual step of endorsing him during the campaign. The endorsement was a leadership decision and not decided on by a unionwide vote. Union chief Brandon Judd was part of Trump's transition team.

When Trump visited the Department of Homeland Security on Wednesday, he singled out Judd while pointedly avoiding mention of Morgan. Morgan was not at the event.

Despite pressure from the union, many agency officials said Morgan appeared to embrace the job. Less than a week ago, the first message on his new Twitter account read, "Chief Morgan here – excited to use this account to share the latest news and events of the #BorderPatrol with followers."

Deputy Chief Carla Provost, who has been with the agency since 1995, will be the agency's acting chief, according to an internal memo to agents in the Border Patrol's Tucson office that was obtained by the AP.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Morgan's ouster occurred amid a shakeup across the agencies of government.

The State Department on Thursday said several senior management officials as well as a top arms control diplomat would be leaving. All had submitted resignations before Trump became president as required of officials holding president-appointed jobs. But they weren't required to leave the foreign service.

Spagat reported from San Diego.

Border Patrol Chief, An Agency Outsider, Is Stepping Down

By Ron Nixon

New York Times, January 26, 2017

Mark Morgan, who has led the United States Border Patrol for just a few months, will leave the agency just days after President Trump announced plans to increase the number of agents, according to a statement Thursday from Customs and Border Protection, which oversees the agency.

Mr. Morgan told senior Border Patrol officials that he had been asked to resign, said one official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the official was not authorized to speak to the news media. The official described staff members as shocked.

Mr. Morgan's last day at the agency, which has more than 20,000 agents and is responsible for border security, is Tuesday. He could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Morgan had expressed a desire to stay at the agency in the Trump administration, a Department of Homeland Security official said.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk about internal staffing issues, said Mr. Morgan had sent an internal email to Border Patrol staff members after the election criticizing the immigration enforcement policies of President Barack Obama and his Homeland Security secretary, Jeh C. Johnson.

The official said it appeared to be an attempt by Mr. Morgan to please the incoming administration, which had made border security a key campaign platform.

Mr. Morgan, a former F.B.I. agent, was appointed chief in June and took over in October. He was the first chief in the agency's 93-year history who had never worked as a border patrol agent. He had led the internal affairs office at Customs and Border Protection before taking over the Border Patrol.

His appointment drew criticism from the National Border Patrol Council, the union for Border Patrol workers, which said an insider should have been appointed to head the agency.

The union endorsed Mr. Trump during the election, and the union's president, Brandon Judd, also served on Mr. Trump's transition team.

Shawn Moran, a union spokesman, declined to comment on Mr. Morgan's departure.

In announcing a crackdown on illegal immigration in a speech at the Department of Homeland Security on Wednesday, Mr. Trump took care to praise the union's president and the Border Patrol, which had members in the front rows.

Mr. Trump also praised Immigration and Customs Enforcement, whose union also endorsed him. One executive order Mr. Trump signed on Wednesday will add 5,000 new agents to the Border Patrol and reverse several Obama-era policies that agents say impaired their ability to secure the border.

The president did not single out other services in attendance for praise, such as the Transportation Security Administration or Coast Guard.

R. Gil Kerlikowske, who stepped down as the commissioner of Customs and Border Protection last week and who appointed Mr. Morgan to head the border patrol, said he was not surprised by Mr. Morgan's departure, given the union opposition to his hiring.

"They were very vocal about an outsider coming in, even with his credentials as a police officer, deputy sheriff," Mr. Kerlikowske said. "It's very concerning to have a union making those kinds of decisions."

Customs and Border Protection did not say who would replace Mr. Morgan. During the presidential campaign, Joseph Arpaio, the former sheriff of Maricopa County in Arizona, who clashed with the Obama administration over his illegal immigration raids, was mentioned as a possible replacement.

The Border Patrol has come under scrutiny for what some critics say is an inability to discipline officers and for policies concerning the use of force. A cross-border shooting in which a border agent shot and killed a Mexican boy in 2012 caused a diplomatic row with Mexico.

Dozens of Border Patrol agents have been arrested in recent years on corruption charges, including taking bribes to allow drugs and illegal immigrants to enter the country.

Montini: Will Trump Tap Arpaio To Head Border Patrol?

By EJ Montini

Arizona Republic, January 26, 2017

Even before he took office were those in Donald Trump's transition team who wanted the president to hire dethroned Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio to head the border patrol.

Now, he has his chance.

The head of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, Mark Morgan, has resigned.

We all know how much Trump like Arpaio. And vice versa.

ADVERTISING

The former sheriff was Trump's earliest nationally known political backer. He loves the idea of the wall. He got into trouble for too aggressively (and illegally) rounding up suspected illegal immigrants. He appeared with Trump on the campaign trail number times and spoke at the Republican National Convention.

Sure, he has that little problem of a federal criminal contempt trial for defying a judge's order that his deputies stop targeting Latinos.

But, hey, Arpaio has worn that charge like a badge of honor.

And has been praised for it by Trump backers.

Like Willian Gheen, president of the Americans for Legal Immigration PAC, who said of Arpaio, "The American public is very thankful that Sheriff Joe Arpaio has stood up to the Obama administration and all of the power groups that are backing the illegal immigrant invasion of America."

In our old universe – the one that existed prior to Trump's election – it would have been considered inappropriate and best and political suicide at worst to appoint someone to such a position while that person is facing a criminal trial.

But we don't live in that world anymore.

And that last thing that we would be if Trump tapped Arpaio to head the border patrol is … surprised.

Border Patrol Chief Out One Day After Trump Wall Announcement

By Paulina Firozi

The Hill, January 26, 2017

The U.S. Border Patrol Chief Mark Morgan has reportedly left the agency a day after President Trump signed an executive order to build a wall on the Mexican border.

The Associated Press report, citing current and former U.S. officials, said Morgan was no longer in his post, though it was not clear if he resigned or was asked to leave.

Trump promised during his presidential campaign that he would build a wall on the Mexican border and that Mexico would pay for it.

In signing the order, he fulfilled part of the pledge, though it does not appear that Mexico will pay for it.

"This is a law enforcement agency," Trump said during his announcement following the order during a visit to the Department of Homeland Security on Wednesday."But for too long, your offices and agents haven't been allowed to properly do their jobs.

"From here on out, I'm asking all of you to enforce the laws of the United States of America. They will be enforced and enforced strongly."

Mexico's president has canceled a planned meeting with Trump because of Trump's actions on the border.

Border Patrol Chief, Who Once Backed Immigration Reform, Removed From Office

Fox News, January 26, 2017

The Border Patrol chief has been removed from office, a day after President Trump signed an executive order to build a wall at the U.S.-Mexico border and hire 5,000 more agents, sources confirmed to Fox News Thursday.

The Associated Press first reported Thursday that Mark Morgan told senior Border Patrol agents that he was asked to leave, and said he had chosen to resign rather than fight the removal request.

Morgan was named to the post in June and took office in October. His hiring had caused concern among the rank-and-file as he was not a former agent himself.

Sources told Fox News that the latest move was to show that Customs and Border Protection is going in a new, and more aggressive, direction.

Morgan's last day will be Jan. 31 and sources said a new chief has already been identified. Sources say he is more in line with the Trump administration on border issues.

In a statement, Kevin McAleenan, the Customs and Border Protection's acting commissioner, praised Morgan for "his unwavering dedication to our border security mission" and "lifelong career in service to the nation."

The White House released a statement saying that the post is a political appointment and therefore "all officers understand the President may choose to replace them at any time."

"No officer accepts a political appointment with the expectation that it is unlimited," the statement said.

Morgan had clashed frequently with the Border Patrol union, which backed Trump and criticized Morgan frequently. The union was infuriated when Morgan told a Senate hearing in December that he supported a comprehensive immigration overhaul – assumed to include a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Morgan later clarified his statement sying he did not support "blanket amnesty" and encouraged union members to listen to his testimony.

Agency officials told The Associated Press that Morgan appeared to embrace the job. Less than a week ago, the first message on his new Twitter account read, "Chief Morgan here – excited to use this account to share the latest news and events of the #BorderPatrol with followers."

Border Patrol Chief Resigns After Clashing With Powerful Union

By Jerry Markon, Lisa Rein, Wesley Lowery

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

The chief of the U.S. Border Patrol has resigned after only six months on the job, one day after President Trump announced plans to ratchet up immigration enforcement and build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, officials said Thursday.

It was not immediately clear why Mark Morgan — a career FBI official who was the first outsider to lead the agency responsible for securing the U.S. borders — left the agency. His resignation is effective Jan. 31, officials said.

But Morgan had clashed with the powerful Border Patrol union, which endorsed Trump for president and whose leaders were present at Trump's announcement of his immigration crackdown at Department of Homeland Security headquarters Friday.

Gil Kerlikowske, former commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, which oversees the Border Patrol, said in an interview that the union never supported Morgan for the job and appeared to be behind his departure.

"The union has been very vocal about someone from outside of the Border Patrol becoming the head of the Border Patrol," Kerlikowske said. "The union supported this candidate for president, and now very much appears to be directing things – which is absolutely unheard of in law enforcement. The union used their influence to have him removed."

A few weeks after Trump's election, the conservative website Bretibart.com published an op-ed by the executive board of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents 16,500 agents. The piece was titled, "The chief Obama gave us is a disgrace." It criticized Morgan's leadership of the agency, in part latching onto a statement he made to members of Congress that said he supported "comprehensive immigration reform." The union called this a partisan view.

Morgan could not immediately be reached for comment.

Union spokesman Shaun Moran said he was under orders not to discuss the union's role in Morgan's departure.

But responding to Kerlikowske's comments, Moran said: "We supported President Trump because he was the only candidate who talked about taking action on border security. His actions over the past few days show it was not just campaign rhetoric, but a true conviction to protect Americans from the dangers of illegal immigration."

He accused Kerlikowske of rolling back enforcement operations and "preventing agents from doing their jobs."

"Gil Kerlikowske had multiple opportunities to work with the union to help protect Americans. He chose not to do so."

Kevin K. McAleenan, acting commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, praised Morgan "for his unwavering dedication to our border security mission" and "his lifelong career in service to the nation." His statement did not explain Morgan's departure.

The Border Patrol will have an important role in enforcing Trump's crackdown on the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants. The president on Wednesday signed executive actions to order the construction of his controversial southwest border wall and cut off funds to cities that do not report undocumented immigrants to federal authorities. Trump also called for thousands of additional Border Patrol agents. There are now about 21,000.

Brandon Judd, president of the National Border Patrol Council, was standing behind Trump as the president signed Wednesday's executive order on border security. Morgan was not. And in his speech to DHS employees, Trump called on Judd to stand and be recognized.

Morgan, 52, started his career as a Los Angeles police officer before ascending the ranks of the FBI. Kerlikowske chose him for the Border Patrol job, overlooking others who came up through the ranks, to change what is considered, even by law enforcement standards, to be an insular culture. Many agents, including the Border Patrol union, opposed the selection at the time, saying an outsider could never gain agents' trust.

Morgan told The Washington Post in an interview last September that his first priority was to change the culture of the agency, which had for years faced allegations of an overly confrontational approach in its enforcement that resulted in multiple fatal shootings of illegal immigrants and a lack of accountability in investigating misconduct.

Morgan said he wanted to solve those problems. " It was a culture of not getting out and talking about the issues, not being transparent about the process and it drove the perception there was a culture problem," he told The Post.

Two years ago, Kerlikowske had brought Morgan over from the FBI to run the internal affairs office at the larger Customs and Border Protection agency after removing the longtime official in the job. That official had been criticized for failing to investigate multiple allegations that Border Patrol agents had used excessive force on migrants. Morgan was then promoted to run the Border Patrol in July.

During his short tenure, Morgan enforced new use-of-force policies in the agency's training academy curriculum that encouraged recruits to turn to other strategies to defuse encounters that could get violent. He was working with agents to help them develop better intelligence on drug cartels and smugglers behind illegal border crossings, and was also seeking to create a system to better review cases in which agents fire their weapons.

Law enforcement officials describe Morgan — who was a career, not political appointee — as a careerist, as opposed to being a political partisan.

"He's not a political guy," said Jim Pasco, executive director the nation Fraternal Order of Police. "I've never heard a bad thing about him – and I work for a union, we hear bad things about everyone."

Border Patrol Chief Is Abruptly Out After Being Brought In As A Reformer

By Brian Bennett

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

The chief of the Border Patrol will leave his post at the end of the month, likely the result of a change in direction by the Trump administration and a reflection of the new power of the agency's union.

Mark Morgan, the agency's head, was hired from the FBI in June to reform the force after a series of corruption allegations and problems with excessive force. He will leave the Border Patrol abruptly after seven months on the job, according to a person familiar with the decision who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Morgan's departure was first reported by the Associated Press.

Morgan spent 20 years at the FBI and was first brought to Customs and Border Protection, the Border Patrol's parent agency, in 2014 to overhaul its internal affairs division. After a subsequent stint running the FBI's training academy, he started the top job at the Border Patrol in June.

The Border Patrol's union had opposed Morgan's appointment, preferring a candidate who had risen through the ranks of the agency.

The union endorsed President Trump in the election, breaking with its practice of remaining neutral in elections.

News of Morgan's departure comes a day after Trump announced he would build a border wall and hire 5,000 more Border Patrol agents, bringing the total force to 26,000. Trump said the Border Patrol union would have a lot of clout in department decisions.

Head Of Border Patrol Union Weighs In On Trump's Wall Plans : NPR

NPR, January 26, 2017

The U.S. Border Patrol agents' union backed Donald Trump's candidacy. Steve Inskeep talks with union leader Brandon Judd about the president's executive action on a border wall and sanctuary cities.

STEVE INSKEEP, HOST:

When President Trump spoke to people at the Department of Homeland Security yesterday, Brandon Judd was in the audience. He's president of the union that represents U.S. Border Patrol agents, the National Border Patrol Council, which endorsed Trump during the campaign. He was present to hear the president say he's going ahead with building a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border, among other immigration measures, and he's in our studio this morning. Mr. Judd, welcome back to the program.

BRANDON JUDD: Good morning, Steve.

INSKEEP: So how different is the border going to be assuming that the president's orders are carried out here?

JUDD: I don't think it's going to be – well, OK, it's going to be a lot more secure. But what we're talking about is we're talking about a wall in strategic locations. We're not talking about a great wall of the United States. We're not talking about a continuous wall from California down to Texas. We're talking about a wall in strategic locations which then helps the Border Patrol agents do their job better.

INSKEEP: Because there are some places that are so sparsely populated and the ground is so fierce or so harsh you really don't need...

JUDD: Correct, correct.

INSKEEP: So you've told us when you were on the program last time that about 10 to 15 percent of the border has serious fences in your view and maybe you'd double that under this proposal.

JUDD: That's what I'm thinking. Again, I don't have the exact specifics of what they're going to do, but I do know that they're looking in specific places like Laredo, Texas, where we have very, very little walls. Yet, the state that Laredo, Texas, borders is extremely violent. And so we're looking in locations like that. They're looking in locations like that, but I think it's going to be very effective.

INSKEEP: What have you made of the really visceral response to this, the negative response to this from many people in the United States as well as from Mexico?

JUDD: Well, I can understand, but you – but, Steve, you have to understand there's a lot of rhetoric out there and a lot of what's being put out there – I mean, I've heard that this is a racist wall. This isn't a racist wall. We're not talking about keeping out legal immigrants. We're talking about keeping out illegal immigrants, and it has nothing to do with race because we get people from all – from everywhere. We get people from Russia who are white that cross the border illegally. And so this isn't a racist wall. This is about the security and safety of the United States.

INSKEEP: Although some people have pointed out nobody is talking about a wall on the Canadian border.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

JUDD: No, but we don't have the same problems on the Canadian border. In fact, that's where I work right now. I work on the Canadian border, and we just don't have the same number of people crossing the Canadian border illegally like what we do on the southwest border. It's a lot cheaper to go down to Mexico and cross the southwest border.

INSKEEP: What do you think about the president's effort to compel, if he can, local and state authorities to be more helpful to the Border Patrol and immigration authorities in doing their jobs and rounding up people who are here illegally?

JUDD: Well – so my understanding is that he's not compelling them to help us round them up. But what he is saying is if they come in contact, if a police officer, say, from Phoenix Police Department – if a police officer from the Phoenix, Ariz., police department comes in contact with somebody that he knows is here or suspects that is here illegally, then his responsibility is to contact an immigration enforcement officer to come in and find out. It's the same with me. As a Border Patrol agent, if I make a vehicle stop and I find that illegal activity is taking place outside of the laws that I enforce...

INSKEEP: Drunk driver for example.

JUDD: Exactly – it's my responsibility to call the local law – the local law enforcement so that they can come out and take care of the problem.

INSKEEP: Are we not actually arguing about that much then? Because there are local authorities who are saying, yeah, yeah, if we find somebody who's obviously in violation, we have to turn them over, but we do not want to make that our job. We don't want it to be our job to seek them out or to hold people when otherwise there would not be reason to hold them.

JUDD: And it's not going to be their job. It's not going to be their job to go seek out illegal immigrants in the United States. That is immigrations officers' jobs and it's not theirs. But if they do come in contact with people that are in the country illegally, they should have a responsibility and duty to report people that are breaking the law.

INSKEEP: In a few seconds, how different do you think the country could be in three or four years if these proposals are carried out?

JUDD: Well, I think the country is going to be a lot safer.

INSKEEP: A lot safer.

JUDD: I really do, yes, absolutely. I mean, I was there with what they call the angel families, families that had children that were killed by persons that were in the United States illegally. If these laws are carried out properly – and he's not talking about new laws. By the way, he's not saying that he's going to give us new laws. He's talking about enforcing the laws that are currently on the books.

INSKEEP: Brandon Judd, thanks for coming by. I really appreciate it.

JUDD: Appreciate it, thank you.

INSKEEP: He is the head of the Border Patrol union.

Head Of Border Patrol Union Says Misplaced Agents Delaying Security Measures

By Matthew Wisner

Yahoo! News, January 26, 2017

At the Department of Homeland Security Wednesday, President Trump announced plans to begin work on a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border as well as hire 5,000 additional Border Patrol agents. Border Patrol Union President Brandon Judd appeared on the FOX Business Network Thursday and explained why he feels 5,000 agents is enough to secure the border.

"It is enough. In fact, if we were able to put all the agents that we currently have on the border, we would be able to secure the border given that we get the additional technology such as the wall," Judd told the FOX Business Network's Stuart Varney.

The issue, according to Judd, is that many patrol agents are assigned to duties other than securing the border.

"We have agents that are in [a] PR department for the agency, we have agents doing labor-employee relations instead of actually on the border, securing the border."

On the other hand, Judd explained that if the administration decides to keep those agents at their current positions, the additional 5,000 agents would be necessary.

"If the agency determines that those individuals are needed in the places that they're at, then we do need that additional 5,000 agents in order to secure the border."

Border Patrol Agent's Radio Blocks Knife In Struggle Near Tucson

By Carmen Duarte

Arizona Daily Star, January 26, 2017

A Border Patrol agent struggled with an undocumented immigrant who attempted to stab the agent, but instead struck a handheld radio, authorities said.

The incident occurred shortly after 9 p.m. Tuesday near Three Points, according to a U.S. Customs and Border Protection news release.

The struggling agent received help from another agent who was in an Air and Marine Operations helicopter that landed in a clearing.

The suspect was arrested.

The incident began after the helicopter crew responded to a report of about 10 migrants walking in the desert near Three Points. The air crew spotted the group and was guiding Border Patrol agents on the ground toward the group's location, authorities said.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The air crew reported seeing one man fleeing from the group. A Border Patrol agent made contact with the man and both began to struggle.

During the struggle, the man pulled out a knife and tried to stab the agent, but struck the agent's handheld radio. The radio was attached to the agent's body armor, authorities said.

The agent called for help while struggling with the man. Once the helicopter landed, another agent went to his aid and both restrained and arrested the man, said authorities.

Border Patrol Agent Charged In Millcreek Crashes

By Tim Hahn

Erie (PA) Times-News, January 26, 2017

An incident in Millcreek Township earlier this month in which police said two moving vehicles were run into and one of the drivers was run over involved a U.S. Border Patrol agent stationed locally.

The agent, 43-year-old Norman A. Antuzzi, of Millcreek Township, is scheduled to appear in court Feb. 21 to face 13 misdemeanor and summary charges related to a series of crashes that township police accuse Antuzzi of causing while traveling through Millcreek, while off-duty, on the afternoon of Jan. 14.

Antuzzi is free on $50,000 unsecured bond in the case following his arraignment by Harborcreek Township District Judge Mark Krahe on Jan. 19. His job status as a local Border Patrol agent was unknown Thursday afternoon.

Antuzzi's lawyer, Stephen Sebald, said Thursday afternoon that Antuzzi is currently in an inpatient treatment setting, in a special program to help people suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder.

Millcreek police charge in the criminal complaint that Antuzzi, while driving a Subaru Impreza, ran into the back of a Honda Accord while both vehicles were traveling east on Young Road. The driver of the Honda told police he attempted to pull over when the Subaru struck his vehicle from behind a second time before the Subaru continued traveling east, with the driver appearing to be yelling at the Honda driver, Millcreek police Patrolman Michael Fitzgerald wrote in the affidavit of probable cause accompanying the criminal complaint.

Police charge that Antuzzi then struck a Dodge Caravan at the intersection of Arbuckle and Old French roads, backed up and rammed the van a second time. The 83-year-old driver of the van got out, approached Antuzzi's vehicle and attempted to open the door. Antuzzi pushed the door into the man, knocking him backward, then turned his vehicle left and intentionally struck the other driver, knocking him to the ground and running over his left foot, Fitzgerald wrote in the affidavit.

The van driver and his 79-year-old wife were both taken to Saint Vincent Health Center for treatment.

Investigators said they traced the license plate on the Subaru to Antuzzi's residence, where they spotted the Subaru in the garage but did not get a response when they knocked on the door. Antuzzi called Millcreek police the next day, and when Fitzgerald asked him what happened the day before Antuzzi replied that he did not remember, according to the affidavit.

According to a statement released by the U.S. Border Patrol on Thursday afternoon, Antuzzi was notified by Millcreek police on Jan. 19 to appear in district court for his initial appearance regarding several traffic incidents he was reportedly involved in on Jan. 14 while in an off-duty capacity. The U.S. Border Patrol, and U.S. Customs and Border Protection's Office of Professional Responsibility, are fully cooperating with local authorities handling the case, according to the statement.

Officials also wrote in the statement that Customs and Border Protection does not tolerate the misconduct of any employee, and stresses the importance of maintaining the highest levels of professionalism and integrity throughout the organization.

The Border Patrol has had a presence in Erie since the agency was founded in the 1920s, but became a fixture in the community when a station was opened on Erie's bayfront in 2004. The agents assigned to Erie, the exact number of which is not released, now work out of a facility off Route 98 in Fairview Township that opened in 2010. The agency is charged primarily with protecting U.S. borders from terrorists and weapons of mass production, and agents in Erie cover an area stretching from western New York to eastern Ohio.

The Jan. 14 incident wasn't Antuzzi's first run-in with local law enforcement over his driving habits.

Edinboro police charged Antuzzi with driving under the influence, and with summary traffic violations including speeding and careless driving, following another off-duty incident that happened on West Plum Street in the borough on the early morning of Aug. 14. According to information in the criminal complaint filed by Edinboro police Patrolman Jerry Lawrence, the officer was on routine patrol when another vehicle sped up to his police cruiser from behind, driving right up to the bumper, before passing the patrol car on the left side.

Lawrence wrote in the affidavit of probable cause accompanying the complaint that he stopped Antuzzi's vehicle and gave him three field sobriety tests, which Antuzzi failed.

"The driver, Norman Antuzzi, told this officer that he could not do the tests because he was drunk," Lawrence wrote in the affidavit.

Antuzzi was then taken to the Edinboro police station and was given a breathalyzer test, which showed positive results for alcohol, according to the affidavit.

Antuzzi was charged by summons in the case. He waived the charges to court at his Sept. 29 preliminary hearing before McKean District Judge Denise Stuck-Lewis, and he was released with no bond set.

Antuzzi waived his formal arraignment in the case in November and has applied for Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition, a program that grants probation to nonviolent, first-time offenders in Erie County, according to court documents.

Border Patrol Agents Arrest Italian Felon

Sonoran News (AZ), January 26, 2017

TUCSON – An Italian man identified as Salvatore Marciante, 56, was apprehended in Nogales, Arizona, on Jan. 21 for being illegally present in the United States.

Criminal and immigration checks revealed that Marciante previously resided in Staten Island, New York and was deported from the United States in 2004 after serving time for involvement in drug related criminal activity.

Marciante is being prosecuted for illegal re-entry of a felon, as per Tucson Sector guidelines.

Federal law allows the Border Patrol to charge individuals by complaint, a method that allows the filing of charges for criminal activity without inferring guilt. An individual is presumed innocent unless and until competent evidence is presented to a jury that establishes guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Customs and Border Protection welcomes assistance from the community. Citizens can report suspicious activity to the Border Patrol and remain anonymous by calling 1-877-872-7435 toll free.

TSA Adds 11 New Airlines To PreCheck Program

By Melanie Zanona

The Hill, January 26, 2017

The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has ramped up its expedited screening program to include 11 new airlines, the agency announced Thursday.

The TSA's PreCheck program will now be available for eligible passengers flying on Aruba Airlines, Avianca, Boutique Airlines, Emirates, Key Lime Air, Miami Air International, Southern Airways Express, Spirit Airlines, Sunwing, Virgin Atlantic and Xtra Airways.

The latest expansion brings the total number of airlines participating in PreCheck to 30.

"Partnering with 11 additional airlines to offer TSA PreCheck will significantly increase our trusted traveler population, and reflects our commitment to implement the most effective aviation security," said TSA acting Administrator Huban A. Gowadia. "By collaborating with our partners in industry and the aviation community, we will continue to increase the number of airlines participating in TSA PreCheck, enabling more eligible travelers across the country to experience expedited screening."

The screening program allows passengers who have undergone background checks to move through expedited security lanes without taking off their shoes or removing electronics from their bags. The enrollment fee is $85 and lasts for five years.

TSA officials have relied on PreCheck to help improve security and ease massive airport security lines, which caused major headaches for passengers and officials last spring.

PreCheck initially ran into trouble after the agency overestimated how many passengers would sign up for the program and cut screening staff in anticipation of enrollment.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS-17-0435-A-000451

But former TSA Administrator Peter Neffenger quickly began raising public awareness about the program, while Congress passed an aviation bill last summer designed to further boost enrollment.

As a result, PreCheck enrollment spiked over the last year, with average daily sign-ups in 2016 double what they were in 2015.

An increasing number of companies also began to reimburse their employees for the program, while some air carriers started allowing travelers to purchase PreCheck with airline points.

Spirit Airlines Joins TSA PreCheck

By Susan Glaser

Cleveland Plain Dealer, January 26, 2017

CLEVELAND, Ohio – Spirit Airlines today joined the Transportation Security Administration's PreCheck program, which allows pre-screened passengers to avoid long lines at airport security.

Effective immediately, passengers who are already enrolled in TSA PreCheck can use the service when flying on Spirit.

"We are thrilled to give our customers options for a more efficient and expedited security screening experience," John Bendoraitis, chief operating officer and senior vice president of Spirit, said in a statement.

Spirit was the last major U.S. airline to offer the program to its customers.

In previous interviews, Spirit officials cited both the cost of participating in PreCheck and factors related to the airline's reservation system for the delay. Those problems, apparently, have been resolved.

For travelers not enrolled in PreCheck, Bendoraitis noted that the airline offers a program called Shortcut Security, for an extra fee, at some airports, including Cleveland Hopkins. Spirit serves 11 destinations from Cleveland and six from Akron-Canton.

Federal Aid Approved For Georgia In Latest Storm

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

ALBANY, Ga. (AP) – Gov. Nathan Deal says the White House has approved federal aid for southwest Georgia residents recovering after deadly tornadoes and thunderstorms struck last weekend.

Deal said Thursday that President Donald Trump has granted assistance for six counties that suffered severe damage as waves of storms hammered the Southeast on Saturday and Sunday. Twenty people died in the region, including 15 in Georgia.

Deal said he expects the White House will later approve federal aid to 10 additional Georgia counties included in the governor's emergency declaration.

Trump's initial declaration Thursday frees up federal assistance to residents of Berrien, Cook, Crisp, Dougherty, Turner and Wilcox counties. On Wednesday, the White House also approved aid for prior storms that damaged southwest Georgia on Jan. 2.

10:20 a.m.

The National Weather Service says a powerful EF3 tornado packing peak winds of 140 mph was responsible for killing 11 people in southwest Georgia.

The agency reports a survey team confirmed a large twister carved a path of destruction Sunday nearly 25 miles long – and in places nearly a half-mile wide – through Brooks, Cook and Berrien counties. Seven people died at a mobile home park in Cook County when the twister hit before dawn. The other counties counted two deaths apiece.

The Weather Service has confirmed at least 24 tornadoes touched down in Georgia during the weekend storm outbreak. At least 20 people were killed in the Southeast – 15 in Georgia, four in Mississippi and one in Florida.

9:55 a.m.

President Donald Trump has declared a federal disaster in southwest Georgia for a severe storm that caused extensive damage nearly three weeks before another round of tornadoes and thunderstorms devastated the same area.

A statement the White House issued Wednesday says the declaration makes federal aid available for damage inflicted Jan. 2. Assistance for individuals is available for residents of Dougherty County, while aid for government and nonprofit response efforts has been approved for Baker, Calhoun, Early, Mitchell, Turner and Worth counties.

Gov. Nathan Deal said he expects more federal aid to follow after a second wave of severe weather caused even greater destruction last weekend, killing 20 people in the Southeast – 15 in Georgia, four in Mississippi and one in Florida.

Feds Declare A Disaster For Deadly South Georgia Storms

By Greg Bluestein

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The federal government approved another emergency request on Thursday for aid for residents in six counties struck by the wave of storms that left 15 people in Georgia dead.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said the assistance could include grants for temporary housing and home repairs, low-cost loans to cover uninsured property losses and other programs to help victims recover. FEMA has yet to decide on extending the aid to another 10 counties.

"Total devastation," a visibly shaken Deal said after touring a mobile home site in Adel where seven people died. "It's hard to imagine that anyone escaped from that."

More than 770 state employees are clearing debris and providing storm relief, and state lawmakers have set aside an additional $5 million to help with the recovery. But local leaders were hoping President Donald Trump's administration sends more help. Quickly.

"We're helping the victims meet their immediate needs," said Eric Gordon, a pastor at Adel First Assembly. "But we need help for the long-term needs. Where are they going to live long-term? Where are they going to sleep next week?"

The FEMA order means federal funding will also be available to some state and local government agencies as well as some private nonprofits for their emergency work.

It covers residents and businesses in six counties: Berrien, Cook, Crisp, Dougherty, Turner and Wilcox.

FEMA Grants Individual Assistance To Six South Georgia Counties

WXIA-TV Atlanta, January 26, 2017

Georgia Gov. Nathan Deal received notice on Thursday from FEMA that six counties impacted by last weekend's severe storms and tornadoes have been approved for individual assistance.

The six counties approved are Berrien, Cook, Crisp, Dougherty, Turner and Wilcox counties.

"I'm tremendously grateful for the immediate assistance and attention President Trump has given Georgia's requests for federal aid, as well as his concern for our citizens," said Deal. "I'd also like to thank President Trump for sending the acting director of FEMA to view firsthand the horrific effects of this natural disaster. FEMA, along with the Georgia Emergency Management and Homeland Security Agency, is working to expedite financial assessments in the remaining counties impacted by the storms.

"Following my conversations with President Trump and FEMA, I'm confident that public assistance for all 16 counties will be approved expeditiously. This approval is critical to the state as well as local communities."

Deal has requested individual assistance from FEMA for the remaining ten counties presently under a state of emergency as a result of the storms that ravaged south Georgia over the weekend. 15 people were killed and more than 85 people were hurt in the storms that hammered the state Saturday and Sunday. The storms came only weeks after an earlier round of severe weather slammed parts of Dougherty County on New Year's weekend, causing additional damage.

Dougherty, Five Other Counties OK'd For Federal Assistance For Last Weekend's Storms

By Jim Hendricks

Albany (GA) Herald, January 26, 2017

ALBANY — Dougherty County and five other counties in South Georgia were approved Thursday for individual federal assistance for damages sustained by last weekend's tornadoes and storms that left 15 people dead, including four in Dougherty County.

Gov. Nathan Deal announced that the White House and the Federal Emergency Management Agency had approved the assistance for Dougherty, Berrien, Cook, Crisp, Turner and Wilcox counties.

"I'm tremendously grateful for the immediate assistance and attention President Trump has given Georgia's requests for federal aid, as well as his concern for our citizens," said Deal. "I'd also like to thank President Trump for sending the acting director of FEMA to view firsthand the horrific effects of this natural disaster.

"FEMA, along with the Georgia Emergency Management and Homeland Security Agency, is working to expedite financial assessments in the remaining counties impacted by the storms."

Acting FEMA Director Robert Fenton was in Albany on Thursday, viewing damage with Dougherty County Commission Chairman Chris Cohilas.

Deal declared a state of emergency earlier this week for a total of 16 counties and has asked for the federal designation for all of them. The remainder of that list includes Atkinson, Baker, Brooks, Calhoun, Clay, Colquitt, Lowndes, Mitchell, Thomas and Worth counties.

"Following my conversations with President Trump and FEMA, I'm confident that public assistance for all 16 counties will be approved expeditiously," the governor said. "This approval is critical to the state as well as local communities."

After an aerial tour of the Albany area on Wednesday, Deal announced on Twitter during a driving tour of Cook County that Dougherty County had been approved for individual assistance for damage that occurred during the first storm to strike the area on Jan. 2. The governor asked for the federal help for that event on Jan. 10.

The federal approval was much swifter on this latest request, which Deal made Tuesday.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

U.S. Rep. Sanford Bishop, D-Albany, who represents the 2nd Congressional District where much of the damage occurred, said he was pleased to see the second declaration in as many days.

"This second, expanded major disaster declaration will be essential to providing much-needed resources to those in Middle and Southwest Georgia that were impacted by the severe weather this month," Bishop said. "Georgians have always proven to be resilient, and this time will be no different.

"With FEMA's assistance, we will work together to restore a sense of normalcy to our communities."

Bishop said the designation provides federal resources for affected individuals and households, including financial assistance for temporary housing, home repair and damaged essential household items. It also covers disaster-related child care, medical and essential vehicle expenses.

According to the summary provided by the governor's office, the individual assistance designation means that help is available to individuals and households.

FEMA's website notes that assistance that can apply includes:

— Rental payments for temporary housing for those whose homes are unlivable. Initial assistance may be provided for up to three months for homeowners and at least one month for renters. Assistance may be extended if requested, based on a review of individual applicant requirements.

— Grants for home repairs and replacement of essential household items not covered by insurance to make damaged dwellings safe, sanitary and functional.

— Grants to replace personal property and help meet medical, dental, funeral, transportation and other serious disaster-related needs not covered by insurance or other federal, state and charitable aid programs.

John Mills, external affairs representative for FEMA, said Thursday afternoon that it is important for those who have damages to register.

"If you live in one of the six counties and you have damage to your home (whether homeowner or renter), you should register with FEMA for assistance," he said. "Only one registration is needed per household."

The process takes 15-20 minutes and can be done online at disasterassistance.gov or by calling 1 (800) 621-3362 (FEMA), he said. The FEMA website is fema.gov.

The FEMA help is for costs that are not covered by insurance and those that are underinsured. Mills said the only way a person will know whether he or she qualifies for assistance is to sign up. He said it's also important for individuals to let agency officials know if the residence is uninhabitable during registration. The mission, he said, is to help get a storm victim's home "safe, sanitary and functional."

Mills said it is important that individuals document damage, when it occurred and to take photos of the damage if possible. "The more documentation you have, the better," he said, adding it helps not only FEMA, but insurance companies covering claims.

FEMA has other programs as well for public assistance, but they have not been activated.

"The real focus is getting help for individuals," Mills said. "Local governments can start the work they need to do."

Public assistance for emergency work and repair/replacement of disaster-damaged facilities is under review.

Counties also are eligible to apply for assistance under the Hazard Mitigation Grant program for assistance for actions taken to prevent or reduce long-term risk to life and property from natural disasters.

Governor: FEMA Assistance Approved For Weekend Storms

WFXL-TV Albany (GA), January 26, 2017

Six counties affected by the severe weather that came through Southwest Georgia over the weekend has now been approved to get additional assistance.

Georgia Governor Nathan Deal announced Thursday afternoon that the Federal Emergency Management Agency has approved six counties for additional assistance. They include:

Berrien
Cook
Crisp
Dougherty
Turner
Wilcox

"I'm tremendously grateful for the immediate assistance and attention President Trump has given Georgia's requests for federal aid, as well as his concern for our citizens," said Deal. "I'd also like to thank President [Donald] Trump for sending the acting director of FEMA to view firsthand the horrific effects of this natural disaster. FEMA, along with the Georgia Emergency Management and Homeland Security Agency, is working to expedite financial assessments in the remaining counties impacted by the storms.

"Following my conversations with President Trump and FEMA, I'm confident that public assistance for all 16 counties will be approved expeditiously. This approval is critical to the state as well as local communities," added Deal.

This approval comes about 24 hours after Governor Deal announced that FEMA assistance had been granted for dealing with severe weather that came through Southwest Georgia on January 2.

Rep. Scott Tours Damage In Several Counties

By Amanda Hoskins

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

WALB-TV Albany (GA), January 26, 2017

TURNER CO., GA (WALB) –

U.S. House Representative Austin Scott toured Worth, Turner and WIlcox County damage both in the air and on foot.

He saw utter destruction in the many places in Turner County where he grew up.

"It's hard to imagine the property damage without actually seeing it from above and of course it's not just turner county. It's all of the counties. In Worth County this morning I think there are still somewhere around 4,600 homes that are without power," said Scott.

He spoke with childhood friends that lost everything.

"You know these people are our friends, they're neighbors, they're family. This community is strong, and if you'll watch this community you will have neighbors helping neighbors and they will recover pretty fast," said Scott.

Following his tour of Worth and Turner Counties, Scott also walked the areas of Wilcox county that were destroyed.

Turner county will be one of six counties receiving FEMA assistance.

The federal declaration means individual homes will be given assistance from the government.

So homes completely destroyed will likely get help from the government.

FEMA officials were on the ground today talking with folks who have lost everything.

The tornado rolled right through this area with dozens of mobile homes.

In Turner County, alone 31 homes were completely destroyed,17 suffered major damage and another 16 suffered minor damage.

Federal assistance will also be given to the county for emergency work as well as replacing and repairing public facilities.

If you are a homeowner you can to go to disasterassistance.gov to report the damages on your home

This is the very beginning stages.

In the next week you can expect to see a disaster recovery center here in Turner County.

That will be the place where you can go, explain the extent of the damage you have and learn about the help you qualify for.

On His Final Day, Obama Made It Easier For Transgender Immigrants To Get Documents In Order

By Mathew Rodriguez

Mic, January 26, 2017

Former President Barack Obama spent the last few days of his presidency readying America for a Donald Trump administration. He designated new national parks to prevent drilling, commutated sentences for Chelsea Manning and Oscar López Rivera and, as it turns out, helped ensure transgender immigrants are able to get their legal documents in order.

The memo, available on the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Service's policy memoranda page, requires that USCIS change the gender marker on an official document if the person applying for the document presents:

• a court order granting change of sex or gender

• a government-issued document (amended birth certificate, driver's license, etc.) reflecting the requested gender designation

• a letter from a licensed health professional affirming the applicant's gender identity

The most substantive change to the policy is an expansion of the documents accepted to change the gender marker. Previously, applicants needed to supply an amended birth certificate, passport, court order or doctor's note. Accepted documents include the aforementioned, as well as driver's licenses and other federal, state and local official documents that reflects the person's gender identity. Additionally, applicants can now supply official documents from foreign governments.

According to Harper Jean Tobin, policy director at the National Center for Transgender Equality, these are "modest, fairly technical updates" to a policy that's already existed for five years at the federal level. Tobin also pointed out that some states — such as Massachusetts, Maine, Hawaii and Connecticut — have similar or even more progressive stances on changing gender markers.

Tobin said the most important part of this update is that immigrants can now much more easily have all of their USCIS-issued documents — like work permits, visas and green cards — reflect the same gender.

"We're talking about people who need to update these documents to reflect the way they live their lives every day," Tobin said. "If someone lives as a man and works as a male and his ID says he is female, it's embarrassing for him and potentially confusing for his employer or any other official he may come in contact with. Having policies like this that make the procedure better makes sense."

While this benefits documented immigrants, the memo does not help undocumented immigrants, who face an uncertain future under a Trump administration. Trump has already made a slew of announcements about his plans for the American immigration system, including signing an executive order to build his infamous wall and proposing to ban refugees from certain countries from entering the United States. Trump's policies will put barriers, both physical and bureaucratic, between the United States and those looking to immigrate here.

While transgender rights and immigration have been huge issues during the 2016 election, rarely did the media cover them together. Trans immigrant rights last made national news in 2015 when activist and transgender woman Jennicet Gutierrez interrupted Obama during a White House LGBTQ reception to advocate for trans people being mistreated in immigrant detention centers.

The memo does leave open some leeway for USCIS to request more of transgender applicants, however. According to the memo, USCIS can request "additional evidence" of a person's gender identity. The memo also says that if an officer finds "significant substantive discrepancies" or suspects fraud, the case may have to go to a higher authority.

Obama has been an advocate for transgender people in more ways than one. Aside from this eleventh-hour policy memo, Obama's administration issued a historic directive on equal-rights statute Title IX that allowed for transgender students to use public school facilities that matches their gender identity.

Trump's Plan To Halt 'Catch And Release' Of Migrants Could Hit A Wall

Trump Wants To Empower Local Police To Enforce Immigration Law, Raising Fears Of Racial Profiling

By Matt Zapotosky

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

President Trump on Wednesday directed his homeland security secretary to deputize local law enforcement officials to enforce immigration laws, a move that civil rights advocates fear could embolden police to racially profile those they encounter.

The directive came as part of a sweeping executive order that cracks down on people in the country without documentation and the cities that don't readily hand them over for deportation.

The order instructs the homeland security secretary to broker agreements with governors and local officials so that state and local law enforcement authorities can enforce immigration law. It declares that those places deemed "sanctuary jurisdictions," for blocking government communication about people's immigration status, be disallowed from receiving federal grants. And it reinstates a program meant to deport those in the country illegally when they are arrested on other, sometimes minor, offenses.

The directives send "a shot across the bow of immigrant communities and those localities or states that are welcoming of immigrant communities," said Cecillia Wang, deputy legal director at the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Certainly, I think the immediate purpose is to scare immigrant communities and to scare states and localities that have these so-called sanctuary policies, but I do think there's meat to this," Wang said. "It's not an empty letter, and it's not an empty threat."

Trump had promised on the campaign trail to crack down on illegal immigration, and his early actions make good on that vow. He also signed an order Wednesday attempting to spur construction of a proposed border wall between the United States and Mexico.

The Immigration and Nationality Act already allowed the federal government to deputize local officials to enforce immigration law through what are commonly referred to as 287(g) agreements. At one time, Wang said, dozens of jurisdictions had such arrangements with the federal government, though former president Barack Obama curtailed many of them.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement still has 36 agreements in 16 states, but they are all in jails, not with local or state police agencies, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman said. Jessica M. Vaughan, the director of policy studies and the Center for Immigration Studies, which advocates reduced immigration levels, said in 2008 there were more than 60 agreements, including three dozen involving work outside of jails. She said the agreements were a "great program" that at one point were responsible for nearly 20 percent of Immigration and Customs Enforcement criminal deportations.

Wang said the agreements gave local police basis to essentially racially profile those they encountered. A Department of Homeland Security Inspector General investigation in 2010 found that "Claims of civil rights violations have surfaced in connection with several [law enforcement agencies] participating in the program," and advised Immigration and Customs Enforcement to consider civil rights factors when reaching agreements. Former Maricopa County, Ariz., sheriff Joe Arpaio, who now is facing a criminal contempt of court charge for allegedly defying court orders to stop detaining suspected undocumented immigrants without a legal basis, had used the program.

Trump's order, Wang said, would "unleash police agencies that want to get into the deportation business."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Trump also on Wednesday ordered the return of the Secure Communities program, another controversial immigration enforcement mechanism that the Obama administration had dialed back. The program, which was administered from 2008 to 2014, checked the fingerprints of everyone taken into custody in the United States against immigration records, and immigration officials would then move for them to be detained and possibly deported.

Jeh Johnson, Obama's homeland security secretary, had watered the program down slightly, issuing a directive instructing officials to prioritize initiating deportation proceedings against those who posed a danger to public safety. Wang said the effect of that was limited, but Trump's undoing of it was troubling, and his order also seemed to increase the discretion of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, ordering them to prioritize cases against even those who had not been charged with any crimes but had "committed acts that constitute a chargeable criminal offense."

"It's basically just broadening again the untrammeled discretion of ICE agents to determine who they want to pursue for deportation purposes," Wang said.

Trump also gave his homeland security secretary power to designate sanctuary jurisdictions, and he decreed that such jurisdictions should not receive federal grant money. D.C. officials warned that the nation's capital could lose millions — or even billions — in funding over the order, though it remains to be seen if and under what circumstances federal officials will actually act on it.

There is no uniform definition of a sanctuary city. Some places refuse detainer requests from Immigration and Customs Enforcement; others provide identification cards and driver's license to undocumented immigrants. Trump's order seemed to define such jurisdictions only as those that violate a federal law saying officials may not restrict government entities from sending or receiving information regarding a person's immigration status.

The Anti-immigrant President

By Maria Cardona

The Hill, January 26, 2017

Under the guise of national security, Donald Trump has announced a series of executive actions that start the process of building the wall between the U.S. and Mexico, strip protections from non-criminal immigrants and families fleeing other countries, and getting rid of Sanctuary cities.

Word is he will also announce the beginning of the ban on refugees and immigrants of several Muslim-majority countries and the repeal of DACA — deportation protection for Dreamers — in the coming days.

While this will thrill Trump supporters, this is in fact the next part of his continued attack on the immigrant, Latino, and Muslim communities. Trump might as well proclaim the first month of his administration National Anti-Immigrant Month.

Sounds harsh. But while these proclamations are no doubt welcome actions to the nearly half of his supporters who wanted Trump to crackdown on "illegal" immigrants, they have already carried a huge cost to the legal-immigrant community throughout the country, which has suffered both verbal and physical anti-immigrant backlash for the past 18 months.

In an executive order, a president gives instructions to government agencies and departments about how to operate and what policies to pursue. These executive orders he is signing now set the groundwork for real work to begin and allow Trump to claim victory and credit early on in his presidency.

Big day planned on NATIONAL SECURITY tomorrow. Among many other things, we will build the wall!— Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) January 25, 2017

So what exactly did he sign?

Through his executive orders thus far, he has apparently paved the way for the border wall at our southern border to be built. But many parts of the border already have sturdy fencing with virtual Border Patrol agent back-up using state-of-the-art technology.

So does it mean Trump wants to erect a wall in the rugged desert or mountainous regions? Will he claim Eminent Domain in the places where the border happens to be on private property? Will he trounce Tribal Law and build a wall on tribal lands not under U.S. government jurisdiction?

Do his supporters even care that more efficient ways of securing the border would have come to fruition if Comprehensive Immigration Reform had been passed by the GOP lead Congress?

I suspect not. Many of them simply are anti-immigrant and loved Trump's tough talk. Plain and simple. And sad.

Trump also signed an executive order that would crack down on so-called sanctuary cities, though no legal term of the kind actually exists, but "cracking down" on them sure sounds great to his supporters!

In reality, the threat to withhold funds to these cities if they don't turn over undocumented immigrants might be an empty one. Many mayors have vowed to protect these immigrants who would be in jeopardy of deportation even though they have no criminal record and have been productive members of their community.

Trump signs orders stripping "sanctuary cities" of federal funds if they ignore immigration laws https://t.co/4hW7OPaKDI pic.twitter.com/J2EZv55Ynp— The Hill (@thehill) January 26, 2017

Good for these mayors! If Trump withholds funds, it would be detrimental to local law enforcement — which would be anathema to the very supporters Trump is trying to kowtow to with this order.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

He also signed an executive order that would make it easier to deport families who turn themselves in at the border seeking asylum and also broadens the authority of local law enforcement to enforce immigration law.

This means that mothers, fathers, grandparents, who have done nothing but work hard and raise families, seeking a better future for their children, if detained on their way to or from their job, may be deported without delay.

We are similarly hearing word that another executive order is on the way that would in effect mean the repeal of DACA – Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals – made real by President Obama's executive order in 2012. If DACA is repealed and nothing is put in its place legislatively, these 1.5 million kids will live in constant fear and anxiety.

And what about Trump's executive order banning refugees from Syria or a handful of other allegedly terrorist-supporting countries? This is nothing less than the beginning of Trump's Muslim Ban.

I can already hear anti-immigrant Trump supporters spewing hate, saying if you are "illegal" you have no right to be here in the first place. And that if you come from a country that breeds "terrorists" you should not be allowed in.

This misses the mark of the reality the country faces. We have close to 11 million undocumented immigrants. The vast majority — aside from not having documents that allow them to stay — are law-abiding, hard-working men and women who only want a brighter future for their children and families.

Many immigrants do the jobs Americans do not want — they clean our homes, our hotel rooms, grow, harvest, pick, prepare and serve our vegetables, and then they clean the plates afterwards.

Their children are valedictorians, top athletes, talented writers, artists, budding engineers, many are college educated or want to be, and many serve in our armed forces.

They are as American as President Trump is, except for a piece of paper.

The solution has been in front of the U.S. Congress for years — comprehensive immigration reform. If passed tomorrow, it would inject $1.5 trillion in the U.S. economy in the next 10 years, according to a 2010 report from the American Immigration Council. Undocumented workers would come out of the shadows, giving us a real idea of who is here.

With comprehensive reform, we would have much stronger and tougher border security measures that are real and effective instead of expensive and symbolic like Trump's ridiculous wall.

When it comes to refugees, we already have an "extreme vetting" process in place that takes two years to get through for refugees fleeing war torn countries.

Trump wants to end our America as we know it — a welcoming, shining city on a hill that immigrants see as an example to the world where human dignity, freedom and liberty are personified every day.

Well, not this day. For now, the message from the United States of Trump to the world is: Screw you immigrant, stay out.

Sanctuary Cities' Reactions To President Trump's Executive Order

By Eric Ting

San Francisco Chronicle, January 26, 2017

President Donald Trump told the Department of Homeland Security on Wednesday, Jan. 25, that he was moving forward with cutting off millions in federal funding to sanctuary cities.

The president signed an executive order that states that the U.S Attorney General and Secretary of Homeland Security shall "ensure that jurisdictions that willfully refuse to comply with 8 U.S.C. 1373 (sanctuary jurisdictions) are not eligible to receive Federal grants, except as deemed necessary for law enforcement purposes by the Attorney General or the Secretary."

A sanctuary city is a city that does not follow federal immigration laws, and one of Trump's major campaign promises was to "end sanctuary cities."

Several mayors of sanctuary cities have commented on the president's executive order, some saying they are willing to sacrifice federal funding to keep their sanctuary status.

Some cities argued Trump's action is unconstitutional and threatened legal action. In San Francisco, Mayor Ed Lee insisted the city would not let immigrant residents "live in fear."

Seattle Mayor Ed Murray said the Pacific Northwest city would "not be bullied by this administration."

Trump Issues Immigration Orders, But California Cities And Police Aren't Onboard

By Cindy Chang, Paloma Esquivel, Maya Lau, Contact Reporters

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump's plan to enlist local police and sheriff's departments in immigration enforcement has set the stage for a pitched battle with California officials who have long prioritized building ties with immigrant communities.

Trump's plan, which was issued Wednesday as part of a pair of executive orders, seeks to broaden the reach of federal immigration authorities into county jails.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

It also calls for empowering police officers and deputies to act as immigration enforcers, leaving open the possibility that they would be required to inquire about the immigration status of the people they encounter on the streets.

Such a regime could conflict with the Los Angeles Police Department's decades-old policy that prohibits officers from initiating contact with a person solely to ask about whether he or she is in the country legally.

Local governments that defy the Trump administration's immigration policies by acting as "sanctuary cities" could be denied federal funding, one of the executive orders states.

More than 400 jurisdictions across the country, including Los Angeles, San Francisco and about 40 others in California, have such policies protecting immigrants.

California state officials have signaled that they will put up a fight. The California Legislature has selected former U.S. Atty. Gen. Eric H. Holder Jr. to serve as outside counsel on the state's legal strategy for dealing with the incoming administration.

The state's new attorney general, former congressman Xavier Becerra, said at his swearing-in on Tuesday that he will form a united front with officials from other states to defend their policies against any federal challenges.

Hours after Trump signed the executive orders, Los Angeles leaders suggested they would mount a legal challenge if funding is taken away.

Mayor Eric Garcetti told reporters Wednesday that he doesn't believe the federal government can cut off funding to Los Angeles, citing the 10th Amendment, which addresses the powers of state and federal governments.

"We feel very strong the legal case is clear," Garcetti said.

The particulars of Trump's orders are still being dissected by Los Angeles leaders. But City Council President Herb Wesson told reporters that "the city is going to continue to operate the way it operates."

Los Angeles will receive about $500 million this fiscal year from the federal government to pay for an array of services, including port security, anti-gang programs and services for senior citizens.

That doesn't include federal funding that flows to entities such as the Los Angeles Unified School District or Los Angeles Homeless Services Authority.

"It would be folly for any administration to take away funds to protect America's port," Garcetti said. "Or take away vouchers that help get veterans who have fought for our country off the street."

Shortly after Trump's election, LAPD Chief Charlie Beck announced that he would not work with federal authorities on deportation efforts.

"We have built relationships by effective law enforcement that doesn't focus on where a person was born or the color of their skin. And we don't intend to change that," Beck said Wednesday.

Trump's plan for local jails involves reinstating a program called Secure Communities, which asks jail officials to hand inmates over to federal immigration authorities up to 48 hours past when the inmate would otherwise have been released. Federal authorities can ask for inmates who have committed only immigration violations, in addition to those with serious criminal records.

In 2013, California passed the Trust Act, which limited jail officials' ability to cooperate with federal immigration requests to only those inmates who have been convicted of "serious" or "violent" crimes.

In 2014, after a federal court held an Oregon county liable for damages for holding an inmate beyond her release date at the request of immigration authorities, hundreds of cities and counties around the country stopped complying with many immigration hold requests.

Later that year, then-President Obama ended the Secure Communities program, creating a new jail program that focused only on inmates convicted of "significant" criminal offenses or who posed a danger to public safety.

The return of Secure Communities could mean that California sheriffs would have to choose between state law and federal law.

Los Angeles and Orange County sheriff's officials said Wednesday that the president's executive order likely won't have any immediate impact on how they do business.

Federal immigration agents are inside the Los Angeles County jails "almost on a daily basis," said Assistant Sheriff Kelly Harrington, head of the Sheriff's Department's custody division, speaking to the county Board of Supervisors earlier this month.

If the agents want access to an inmate, sheriff's officials vet the name to ensure that the person has been charged or convicted of a serious or violent crime, in accordance with the Trust Act, Harrington said.

Sheriff Jim McDonnell said in a statement Wednesday that Trump's order would not "change the mission" of his department, which he said would continue to follow the Trust Act and other state immigration law.

"Our department policy clearly states that our deputies do not ask for one's immigration status," he said. "Immigration enforcement remains a federal responsibility."

At the Orange County Sheriff's Department, officials are conferring with attorneys to figure out the new landscape.

"What the future looks like a few weeks out, we will talk to county counsel about. But today, nothing is changing," said Lt. Mark Stichter, public information officer for the Orange County Sheriff's Department.

Neither the Los Angeles nor Orange County sheriff's departments permit their deputies to initiate contact with anyone solely on the basis of a suspected immigration violation. Deputies cannot question a suspect about immigration status even if the person was stopped for another reason, officials from both agencies said.

"We do not conduct or participate in any immigration enforcement," Stichter said.

Kern County Sheriff Donny Youngblood, a critic of the Trust Act who once vowed to defy the law, said in an interview Wednesday that he was still reviewing the administration's orders and that it would take some time to sort out the implications. But he is concerned about a possible clash between the state and federal governments over immigration enforcement.

When state and federal laws aren't in sync, he said, law enforcement is "in the crosshairs."

"We're trying to avoid being in the middle," he said.

Youngblood, who worked around limits on immigration holds by letting federal immigration agents into his jails and giving them access to arrest records, said his deputies are not immigration agents and "are not in the business of immigration." They do not ask about immigration status after an arrest.

Hiroshi Motomura, an expert in immigration law at UCLA, said that despite the tough rhetoric in Wednesday's White House announcement, there are constitutional and other legal limits on how much the federal government can punish states and cities that don't go along with its priorities.

"The federal government can't take over state and local governments," Motomura said. "You have a lot of federal vehicles to facilitate cooperation by state and local governments. But there are limits on the federal government's ability to force cooperation."

Chris Newman, an attorney for the National Day Laborer Organizing Network, was involved in legal challenges to oppose Secure Communities under the Obama administration.

He said the policies announced by Trump sounded "eerily similar" to those enacted in the first years of Obama's presidency. Those policies, he said, led to a backlash in many communities in California, which eventually adopted the Trust Act.

Newman predicts a similar backlash in response to Trump's crackdown on illegal immigration.

"The idea of a return to Secure Communities combined with Trump's racist rhetoric will likely inspire more sanctuary policies," he said.

San Francisco Mayor Reiterates Sanctuary Status In Speech

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) – San Francisco Mayor Ed Lee reiterated the city's "sanctuary" status in his annual state of the city speech, a day after President Donald Trump threatened to withhold money from jurisdictions that do not cooperate with federal immigration authorities.

Lee said Thursday that the city is a sanctuary now and forever. He said San Francisco will continue to protect people who are living in the country illegally.

San Francisco receives about $1 billion a year from the federal government. Lee said at a previous press conference that Trump's threat to withhold money lacked specifics so officials are unclear on what might be at stake for the city's budget.

The mayor also highlighted successes as well as challenges to come in the areas of housing, policing and homelessness.

California Attorney General Vows To 'Defend' State's Residents Against Trump Policies : NPR

NPR, January 26, 2017

Steve Inskeep talks with California's new Democratic Attorney General Xavier Becerra, who says he plans to defend the state's liberal immigration and environmental policies against the Trump administration.

STEVE INSKEEP, HOST:

That wall that President Trump wants on the U.S.-Mexico border is meant as just a start. The president, yesterday, ordered a series of acts on immigration.

(SOUNDBITE OF ARCHIVED RECORDING)

PRESIDENT DONALD TRUMP: Ends the policy of catch and release at the border, requires other countries to take back their criminals – they will take them back – cracks down on sanctuary cities.

INSKEEP: Let's talk about that last item – so-called sanctuary cities. Now, there is no place in the United States where a fugitive immigrant is entirely safe from arrest. Federal agents can go where they want. But there are cities and counties which have explicitly said it's not their job to actively help with round-ups.

The president's order threatens those cities with a loss of federal funds. It is not clear that he can legally follow through with that, but many cities and states are responding strongly. We reached California's new Democratic Attorney General Xavier Becerra from a state with many sanctuary cities.

XAVIER BECERRA: We're going to do everything we can to protect the citizens and residents of the state of California. We're going to do everything we can to let people who come to our state to build it know that we want to respect them and defend them. And we're going to do everything we can to make sure we abide by all the laws, starting with the U.S. Constitution.

INSKEEP: What are some things that localities in California refuse to do when it comes to immigration law?

BECERRA: Principally, what it is – is that most of the local jurisdictions and law enforcement refuse to do is to violate the U.S. Constitution by holding people that they no longer have a basis to detain simply because the federal immigration authorities say please hold on to those folks. You cannot detain people, under the Fourth Amendment, without justification to do so.

INSKEEP: Attorney General Becerra, the way that you describe a sanctuary city makes this seem like a rather narrow issue. The term sanctuary city sounds far more dramatic than the acts you're describing.

BECERRA: And that's, Steve, the issue is that some people have tried to turn the word sanctuary into something that it's not. Sanctuary doesn't mean that you're protecting violent, dangerous criminals from the hands of law enforcement, whether federal or local. It simply means that we are not going to go out there and engage in activities that go beyond what the U.S. Constitution says we should do with people who are law-abiding, working hard, improving the neighborhoods and communities where they live.

We also don't want to have people who fear talking to police officers simply because the federal immigration authorities would like our local law enforcement authorities to be aggressive beyond what legally they're supposed to do.

INSKEEP: What is the state of California going to do if cities start losing federal funding over this?

BECERRA: That's a question that has to yet be answered in a way that gives us a chance to look at the facts because the state of California, when it receives federal resources, it does so because it's sent over taxpayer dollars from the people of California. So we will do everything we can to defend our local California taxpayers from being denied the resources that they paid for.

If the federal government has a reason to block funding or deny resources to the state of California, we will certainly look at that and challenge it if it doesn't seem right. But we don't believe that we should be losing money for police officers and community policing simply because we're abiding by the U.S. Constitution when it comes to the treatment of immigrants.

INSKEEP: I think you're hinting around at a fact that California is one of the states that, when people calculate these things, tends to pay more in taxes than it receives back. Is that right – federal taxes?

BECERRA: Without a doubt. California is a donor state to the federal Treasury. We always, as taxpayers in the state of California, pay more in taxes than we get back to our state. And so we're going to fight where we need to to make sure that we get the resources that we provided to the federal Treasury. And we'll make sure that we're abiding by every law that we must, starting with the U.S. Constitution.

INSKEEP: Let me ask about another thing, attorney general. California, as some people will know, has stricter auto emission standards than the country as a whole. You had to get, as a state, a waiver from the federal government to impose those standards. President Obama granted the waiver. Now there's a new administration, and the incoming EPA administrator, the nominee, hasn't said definitively whether he would allow that waiver or not. Is that something you would be prepared to go to court to uphold – stricter emission standards for California?

BECERRA: Steve, we're not turning back when it comes to climate change and clean energy. We received a waiver from the federal government. We will do everything we can to defend our position, and we will do more if necessary. We've relied on the representations and the tools that the federal government permitted us to use. And if the federal government wants to, all of a sudden, yank those away, we will do everything we can to prove that, based on the facts and the law, that California has a right to move forward.

INSKEEP: And when you say based on the facts and the law that means that could be another lawsuit if it came to that.

BECERRA: We're going to do what we need to to move forward. We will continue with our policies. We'll continue with our actions that have made California a state where people want to live and work. We'll do whatever we need to do to continue our way of life and our way forward.

INSKEEP: One other thing, attorney general. Of course, there's been a lot of debates about state rights throughout American history. There was a time when more conservative states were asserting state rights against a powerful federal government. Do you find yourself becoming an advocate of state rights?

BECERRA: Steve, what's really interesting in that comparison of the use of states' rights is that in previous generations, some states asserted their rights under the 10th Amendment to challenge other constitutional provisions that protected the rights of individuals.

INSKEEP: Civil rights legislation, for example, right. OK.

BECERRA: Right, or just the 14th Amendment – equal protection under the law. And using the 10th Amendment to try to undermine the 14th Amendment, to me, was not what the founders of this nation meant when they enacted the 10th Amendment.

INSKEEP: We should remind people, the 10th Amendment, if I'm not mistaken, says that all powers that are not explicitly granted to the federal government are reserved to the states. Is that right?

BECERRA: That's correct. When we talk about the rights of states to move forward, whether it's on clean energy or our treatment of immigrants, it's to respect the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, not undermine the Bill of Rights.

INSKEEP: California Attorney General Xavier Becerra, thanks very much.

BECERRA: Steve, thank you.

De Blasio Says Trump Targeting 'Sanctuary Cities' Like NYC Is A Threat To Safety

By Erin Durkin, New York Daily News

New York Daily News, January 26, 2017

President Trump's executive order targeting jurisdictions that harbor undocumented immigrants is "going to make cities less safe," Mayor de Blasio said Thursday.

Appearing on CNN Thursday morning, de Blasio said the order to strip federal grants from "sanctuary cities" threatened to upend years of progress police departments have made cultivating trust in immigrant neighborhoods.

"This is the kind of thing that will destroy that promise, and make it impossible for the police to keep cities safe," he said. "New York City has half a million undocumented people. We want them to come forward and work with the police if they see a crime, if they're a victim of a crime. If they believe by talking to a police officer they will get deported and be torn apart from their family, they're not going to work with police."

NYPD officers, and other city employees, generally do not inquire about the immigration status of people they come into contact with on the job — and do not disclose it to federal authorities if they learn it.

For the large majority of crimes, city jails refuse to hand over people who have been arrested when requested by the feds for deportation proceedings. But there are 170 serious crimes that would trigger the city to cooperate.

"If someone's truly a violent criminal, absolutely, they should be deported," de Blasio said.

New York does not plan to alter its policies in response to the executive order, and the mayor reiterated that the city will sue if funding is stripped because of it. The order does not spell out exactly what money will be withdrawn — the city gets $7 billion a year in federal funding, most of which would not be affected by the order — but officials believe about $160 million in anti-terror and Justice Department grants could be at risk.

Mayor de Blasio thinks these new orders will make work harder for the NYPD and other city police departments. (tillsonburg/tillsonburg)

"Police chiefs all over the country are saying, 'Don't do that, don't do that, it's actually going to hurt us,'" de Blasio said. "The money he will take away will actually be from police departments trying to stop terror and trying to stop crime."

The mayor also weighed in on Trump's vague threat to "send in the feds" to Chicago if the "carnage" of high murder rates there doesn't stop, saying he should give the city money to hire more police.

"Provide Mayor [Rahm] Emanuel with the support to add police officers and implement neighborhood policing. Don't go back to a broken policy of stop and frisk," de Blasio said.

De Blasio Threatens Lawsuit Over Trump's Move On Sanctuary Cities

By Rebecca Savransky

The Hill, January 26, 2017

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) is threatening to sue the Trump administration in response to an executive order signed Wednesday to strip federal grants from "sanctuary cities," Politico reported.

"President Trump issued an executive order today and it's purported purpose was to enhance public safety, but here in New York City and in cities across this nation this executive order could in fact undermine public safety," de Blasio said during a press conference at City Hall.

De Blasio said the "potential funding cuts suggested in the executive order would first and foremost fall on the NYPD."

There are "hundreds of American cities where this executive order could undermine public safety," he added.

De Blasio also said the city would not "deport law abiding New Yorkers."

He noted the executive order was "written in a very vague fashion" and therefore is "susceptible to legal challenges."

"The minute any specific action to withhold funding were to occur, that's when Zach Carter is in court the next hour," de Blasio said, referring to the city's corporation counsel.

President Trump on Wednesday signed an executive order that would strip federal grants from cities and states that do not enforce federal immigration laws.

De Blasio said Thursday on CNN that the New York Police Department has spent "decades building relationships with communities, including immigrant communities."

"This is the kind of thing that would destroy that progress and make it impossible for the police to keep cities safe," de Blasio told "New Day."

He said New York City has half a million undocumented people and the city wants them to come forward and talk to police if they witness or are a victim of a crime.

"If they believe by talking to a police officer, they will get deported and be torn apart from their family, they're not going to work with police," he said.

NYC Rejected Nearly All Federal Requests To Hold Illegal Immigrants

New York Post, January 26, 2017

A state lawmaker got into a battle with city officials Thursday over how many undocumented immigrants charged or convicted of crimes were turned over to federal authorities last year.

Assembly member Nicole Malliotakis (R-SI) said NYPD stats show the city cooperated with only two of 80 "detainer" requests from US Immigration and Customs Enforcement between Oct. 1, 2015, and Sept. 30, 2016.

The requests sought people suspected of immigration violations who were charged with, or convicted of, unrelated crimes by local law enforcement agencies.

The issue garnered national attention after President Trump signed an executive order Wednesday that put "sanctuary cities" like New York on notice they could lose federal funds if they don't cooperate on immigration enforcement.

"It's truly frightening that our city refuses to treat criminals in accordance with federal law, and would jeopardize federal funding by harboring individuals who have committed crimes from deportation," said Malliotakis.

"It is time to restore New York City to a law-and-order city."

But city officials countered that they haven't yet acted in 46 of the 80 cases because those individuals are still serving time for crimes.

They said a number of the other individuals sought by ICE weren't convicted of a crime or were misdemeanor cases.

ICE officials couldn't immediately provide a breakdown of the charges or convictions against the 80 people for whom they filed detainers.

In late 2014, de Blasio signed into law a City Council bill that severely reduced the city's cooperation with federal detainer requests — limiting them to cases of felony convictions within the prior five years where the feds have a judicial warrant.

The city also continued to cooperate on cases of possible matches with terrorist watchlists.

In the year before the law was passed — between Oct. 1, 2013, and Sept. 30, 2014 — the city transferred 2,016 detainees to federal custody while not honoring 1,159 requests, according to Department of Correction data.

The mayor has defended the refusal to cooperate in cases involving minor crimes by highlighting a list of 170 felonies where the city does transfer detainees to the feds.

The list of crimes includes felony assault, rape, murder, gun smuggling, witness tampering and patronizing a prostitute.

"If you have done nothing, broken no law, or you've broken a minor law — you went through a stop sign or you had a small amount of marijuana or something like that — we don't cooperate," de Blasio told HOT 97 radio Thursday. "We don't cooperate on minor things."

Malliotakis said the city's list leaves out convictions for other serious crimes, including grand larceny and identity theft.

City officials estimate New York risks losing more than $150 million — all of it at the NYPD's expense — if the Trump administration withholds funding under a narrow interpretation of the executive order.

Meanwhile, the White House said it plans to publish a weekly list of crimes committed by undocumented immigrants in the Big Apple and roughly 300 other sanctuary cities.

The list is meant to inform people about "public safety threats associated with sanctuary" cities, the executive order Trump signed Wednesday says.

"The [Homeland Security] Secretary shall . . . make public a comprehensive list of criminal actions committed by aliens and any jurisdiction that ignored or otherwise failed to honor any detainers with respect to such aliens," the order says.

Long Island Groups: Trump Immigration Orders Foster Fear

By Víctor Manuel Ramos

Newsday (NY), January 26, 2017

Advocates representing immigrants, women's groups and minority communities joined members of a Bay Shore mosque Thursday to condemn immigration enforcement orders from President Donald Trump that they said will harm the most vulnerable.

"An attack on any of us is an attack on all of us," said Alejandra Sorto, an organizer with the Long Island Civic Engagement Table, a Brentwood-based coalition that organized the news conference.

The orders, signed and unveiled Wednesday by the administration, authorize spending and actions to erect a wall along the southern border with Mexico while increasing the hiring of immigration enforcement agents, expanding detention of unauthorized immigrants and stepping up efforts to apprehend and remove immigrants with criminal records and those here illegally.

A ban on visas from specific Muslim-majority countries also is expected, as promised by Trump during the presidential campaign.

Those policies, consistent with Trump's vows to curtail illegal entry and roll back other immigration policies, have stirred up concern in immigrant communities, where many are feeling targeted not only by the expected enforcement but by the climate of mistrust and fear they say it fosters.

The nearly 40 people at the Bay Shore gathering said the orders and statements from Trump will be countered by their campaign for unity, with Latinos, Muslims, Jewish, LGBTQ and women's reproductive rights advocates joining so far what they're calling the Long Island Unity Collaborative.

Trump's emphasis on pursuing enforcement and limiting the influx of people from Muslim-majority countries labeled as terror threats betray the values of this nation, those advocates said.

Muhammad Abdul Jabbar, imam of the Majid Darul Qur'an mosque in Bay Shore, also known as The Muslim Center of Long Island, said the Trump administration's actions send a negative message.

"The negative perceptions and associations created by these executive orders will very likely cause a further increase in hate crimes, discrimination and bigotry against ordinary, law-abiding American Muslims, the Latinos and other minorities," Jabbar said.

Other advocates said they would continue to protest, march, try to engage voters in minority communities and lobby local and state officials to create a firewall against the federal enforcement push.

However, proponents of increased enforcement against illegal immigration don't see any problem with Trump's orders so far.

"It's not un-American for Trump to do what he's doing," said Barrett Psareas, vice president of the Nassau County Civic Association, a residents' group that opposes high taxation and illegal immigration. "He's enforcing what Congress has already authorized" in building the wall and acting on immigration laws.

"What he's doing with the deportations now is if you've committed a crime, you're out. Are families going to be split up? Yeah, but it was not anybody's fault here that people decided to come illegally," Psareas added.

Immigrants' advocates contend the matter is not as simple as just deporting criminals, because the definition of who is deemed a criminal under Trump's orders is a matter of debate, and even those charged with crimes should be given due process before they're ousted, said Irma Solis, director of the Suffolk County Chapter of the New York Civil Liberties Union.

Maryann Slutsky, executive director of immigrant-advocacy group Long Island Wins, said the aggressive enforcement should concern all Americans.

The executive orders "were created with a complete and total lack of compassion," Slutsky said. "These executive orders are not based on national security. They are based on Islamophobia and xenophobia. . . . We are one America. We are one Long Island and we can do better than this."

Immigrant Groups Want Welcoming City Ordinance Strengthened

By Fran Spielman

Chicago Sun-Times, January 26, 2017

Chanting "undocumented, unafraid," immigration activists demanded Thursday that Mayor Rahm Emanuel strengthen Chicago's Welcoming City Ordinance by removing all of the exceptions.

Currently, Chicago Police officers are permitted to cooperate with Immigration and Customs Enforcement if targeted individuals are: in the city's gang database; have pending felony prosecutions or prior felony convictions or if they are the subject of an outstanding criminal warrant.

At a City Hall news conference, immigrant activists joined forces with the Black Youth Project to demand that Emanuel eliminate all of those exceptions.

"The carve-outs … make it so that there [are] immigrants who can be targeted for deportation. Someone who is in the gang database, for example, because a police officer decided that they look like someone who's in a gang can be targeted for deportation without them having any chance to defend themselves," said Tania Unzueta, legal and policy director for Mijente, a national Latino organization.

"What we want is a city where everyone is protected, regardless of whether they've had negative interactions with police. Regardless of whether they have been targeted or criminalized by police," she said. "With those carve-outs in place, immigrants don't feel safe in Chicago."

Unzueta was particularly incensed by the exception made for "pending felony prosecutions."

"We have a court system in the United States that says people are innocent until proven guilty. It is a complete violation of due process for someone to be considered a dangerous person when they actually haven't gone through the court system," she said.

Earlier this week, President Donald Trump signed a series of executive orders to begin to deliver on his campaign promises on the volatile issue of immigration.

The orders authorized construction of the wall Trump promised to build along the Mexican border and empowered his Departments of Justice and Homeland Security to follow through on his threat to cut off funding to sanctuary cities where immigrants can access city services and live without fear of police harassment.

Emanuel responded to the renewed threat by declaring that Chicago will remain a sanctuary city.

The mayor's promise — and the $1.3 million Legal Protection Fund he has created to support immigrants threatened with deportation under Trump — were not enough to satisfy Janae Bonsu, national police chair for the Black Youth Project.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"While Rahm Emanuel has pledged that Chicago will remain a sanctuary city, the bar for what `sanctuary' means has been set way too low," Bonsu said.

"It's not enough to not cooperate with immigration agents for only some undocumented immigrants. It's not enough for the city to rely on this 'good immigrant, bad immigrant' dichotomy that uses alleged criminal or gang involvement as a marker of exclusion…The Welcoming City ordinance leaves way too many loopholes and leaves the door wide open for the deportation machine to continue and for mass incarceration and criminalization to remain unchecked."

No aldermen attended Thursday's news conference because none were invited.

But Ald. Ricardo Munoz (22nd) joined rookie Ald. Carlos Ramirez-Rosa (35th) in supporting the drive to eliminate all of the exceptions.

"The Welcoming City ordinance is a good first step. But we need to make sure that it includes all immigrants, [including] people who made mistakes in the past," Munoz said.

"We want to be fair to all of the families. You've got families who have a U.S. citizen, a legal permanent resident and an undocumented all in one household. And if that one undocumented made a mistake — probably got a couple of excessive tickets or maybe even made a mistake that ended up in a lock-up — they should still be able to afford themselves to their rights in this country."

Chicago's days as a "sanctuary city," where undocumented people can access city services and live without fear of police harassment, date back more than 30 years.

In 1985, then-Mayor Harold Washington issued an executive order prohibiting city employees from enforcing federal immigration laws. He made the move to protest the federal government's decision to question people seeking city services and conduct random searches of city records in an effort to find undocumented immigrants.

Four years later, then-Mayor Richard M. Daley affirmed the executive order. In 2006, the City Council turned the order into law as the immigration debate raged on in Congress.

It prohibited city agencies from asking about the immigration status of people seeking city services. The ordinance also prohibited Chicago Police from questioning the immigration status of crime victims, witnesses or other law-abiding citizens.

Despite that city policy, there remained a legal loophole.

When Chicago Police made a stop, ran a criminal background check and found a deportation order, there was no specific standard on what they should do amid mounting pressure from the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency to turn them over.

As a result, a 54-year-old mother from Cameroon stopped after failing to signal a turn was detained for two nights in 2012 after police found a deportation order on her record.

The case of Rose Tchakounte — who was turned over to ICE, but never deported — became a cause célèbre for the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights.

In response, Emanuel and U.S. Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), united behind a so-called "Welcoming City" ordinance that prohibits police from detaining undocumented immigrants unless they are wanted on a criminal warrant or have been convicted of a serious crime.

From a political standpoint, the 2012 news conference was an opportunity for Emanuel to make amends with Gutierrez.

During Emanuel's days as Barack Obama's chief of staff, Gutierrez accused Emanuel of standing in the way of immigration reform and being singularly responsible for Obama's failure to deliver on his campaign promise to Hispanics.

Gutierrez retaliated by endorsing mayoral candidate Gery Chico over Emanuel in the 2011 race for mayor.

Atlanta Mayor Reed Condemns Trump Immigration Move

By James Salzer

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2017

Atlanta Mayor Kasim Reed on Thursday joined his colleagues in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and other major metro areas in criticizing President Donald Trump's executive order on immigration in so-called "sanctuary cities."

Trump on Wednesday promised to halt federal grants to municipalities that do not comply with immigration officials in detaining criminally charged unauthorized immigrants for deportation.

Reed on Thursday condemned the move, saying Atlanta is a welcoming community that "has stood up for the civil and human rights of every person, and we will not waver now.

"Our city stands together," Reed said in a release on Thursday afternoon. "We believe the president's executive orders violate the principles of the U.S. Constitution. We believe these orders promote dangerous public policy, eroding trust between public safety agencies and the communities they serve, which will undermine public safety in the City of Atlanta and nationwide. We believe the courts will agree."

Hundreds marched earlier this month in downtown Atlanta in hopes the metro would become a "sanctuary city." Such a designation, however, would violate Georgia law, which requires full compliance with federal immigration authorities.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Reed said the city will remain open to all, including immigrants, and pledged that Atlanta will stand firm in its commitment.

Twin Cities Mayors Defy Trump On Sanctuary City Order

By Tim Nelson

Rochester (MN) Post-Bulletin, January 26, 2017

The mayors of Minneapolis and St. Paul offered a defiant response to President Donald Trump's executive order against so-called sanctuary cities that he says "willfully violate federal law."

Under the order signed Wednesday, cities with policies against reporting undocumented immigrants to federal authorities could risk losing federal funding. Both Minneapolis and St. Paul could fall into that category.

Minneapolis won't drop its policy that blocks police from reporting immigration violations, Mayor Betsy Hodges said Wednesday.

The rule makes the city and its people safer because victims and witnesses of crime will feel as though they're able to call the cops, Hodges said.

"They will be safe to (call police), and their immigration status will not be questioned," she said. "That will stand in the city of Minneapolis as long as I am mayor."

City staff still are figuring out how much federal money might be at stake, Hodges said, but it could be millions or even tens of millions of dollars.

St. Paul gets about $13 million per year in federal funding. But Mayor Chris Coleman said he doesn't think Trump's order will apply to his city.

The order applies to cities that willfully violate federal law, Coleman said, and St. Paul's immigration policy does not.

For enforcement, the order directs the U.S. Attorney General and Department of Homeland Security to block federal grants — with some exceptions — to cities and other jurisdictions that don't report undocumented immigrants to the Immigration and Naturalization Service when they find them.

The order also directs Homeland Security to publish a list of crimes by undocumented immigrants and any jurisdictions that may have failed to detain them.

Supporters of Trump's order say it has been a long time coming.

Scott Johnson, a Twin Cities attorney and contributor to the conservative website Powerline, said he thinks Minneapolis and St. Paul have no business defying federal law as Trump is defining it, or as presidents have sought to define it for decades — as John F. Kennedy did in 1963.

"There isn't any more justification for sanctuary city policies than there was for George Wallace standing in the schoolhouse door to keep blacks from entering the University of Alabama," he said.

Madison Mayor Won't Alter Sanctuary City Stance

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

MADISON, Wis. (AP) – Madison's mayor says his city will remain a sanctuary for immigrants in the United States illegally even though it could cost federal aid.

President Donald Trump signed an order Wednesday withholding Justice Department and Homeland Security funds from jurisdictions that bar local officials from communicating with federal authorities about someone's immigration status.

Madison Police Chief Mike Koval says his officers never inquire about immigration status. Dane County Sheriff's deputies ask about status when people are booked into jail and notify federal officials.

Mayor Paul Soglin says the city will continue to comply with federal detainer requests. But he maintains nothing states the city must detain immigrants as a condition for receiving funds and city police won't enforce federal immigration laws.

A sheriff's spokeswoman says that department hasn't discussed any changes.

Colleges Brace To Shield Students From Immigration Raids

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 26, 2017

Colleges and universities around the country are preparing to defend their students from potential immigration raids under President Trump, but it's unclear how much power they actually have to shield their students.

School administrators have issued a range of pronouncements to assure their undocumented immigrant students that they won't help Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents track them down on their grounds.

New York University, Portland State University and the University of Pennsylvania are among colleges that have embraced the "sanctuary" moniker and declared that ICE agents will need a court order to step foot onto their campuses. The University of Miami School of Law is providing free, confidential legal consultations to its students, and Arizona State University is offering free counseling to those stressed out over their status.

Others, like Princeton University and Syracuse University, have been more hesitant. They don't embrace the "sanctuary" label, and while their administrators say they will do what they can to protect students, they have warned students that their schools must comply with federal immigration laws.

Maria Rodriguez, executive director of the Florida Immigrant Coalition, said the range of options shows what a difficult line school administrations are walking.

"Some of these statements are symbolic resolutions of welcoming, but some of them have teeth," Rodriguez said. "The community leaders — not just elected officials, but university presidents — need to be much bolder in calling for these protection policies."

The sanctuary policies, which mirror those enacted by many states and churches around the country, were a direct response to Trump's vows on the campaign trail to dramatically increase immigration enforcement. On Wednesday, he started to make good on those promises by calling for a massive increase in deportations, 10,000 new ICE agents and revival of a federal program that deputizes local police officers to enforce immigration laws.

Still, the Trump administration has not said it will specifically target young undocumented immigrants attending colleges and universities, including the 750,000 young undocumented immigrants who were granted deportation protections under President Obama's Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, known as DACA.

Trump said during a speech at the Department of Homeland Security that he would focus deportations instead on undocumented immigrants who have criminal records or pose a threat to the country. When asked about the future of DACA recipients on Wednesday, White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer said of Trump: "He's a family man, he has a huge heart and he understand the significance of this problem."

ICE also has a standing policy that its agents should avoid conducting operations at "sensitive locations," such as schools, churches and hospitals, unless the situation is serious enough and the agent has been given approval by superiors. On Monday, ICE spokeswoman Jennifer Elzea said that policy remains in effect.

The Department of Homeland Security "is committed to ensuring that people seeking to participate in activities or utilize services provided at any sensitive location are free to do so without fear or hesitation," she said.

DACA recipients say that gives them little comfort.

Roberto Benavides, 27, is studying mechanical engineering at Miami Dade College. The Peru native, who first received DACA protection in 2013, said those temporary assurances don't make up for the harsh, anti-immigrant rhetoric he heard from Trump during the presidential campaign.

"We don't know what's going to happen tomorrow, we don't know what's going to happen for the next four years," Benavides said. "The presidents of all the universities here in South Florida have been very vocal supporting us. But we're very worried that President Trump will use executive powers to get the information on all of us and round us up."

There is reason for concern. Jessica Vaughan, director of policy studies at the Center for Immigration Studies, which advocates for lower levels of immigration, doubts that the Trump administration would specifically target college campuses to round up DACA recipients.

"(ICE) is not going to be walking through the library dragging people out or grabbing people in the dining hall," she said. "That's why I think this sanctuary campus movement is a little bit on the hysterical side."

But Vaughan, who has advised the Trump administration on its immigration enforcement options, said there are individual cases where ICE could be forced to grab people on campus. She said many undocumented immigrants were granted DACA despite having checkered criminal histories. And she said there are others who have committed crimes since gaining their protected status who could be targeted.

And on Wednesday, two executive orders signed by Trump make clear that any undocumented immigrant in the U.S. is a potential target for deportation. The orders say that no undocumented immigrant, or any "classes or categories" of them, would be protected.

"DACA should not be a free pass," Vaughan said.

Campuses Wary Of Offering 'Sanctuary' To Undocumented Students

By Julia Preston

New York Times, January 26, 2017

Janet Napolitano, president of the University of California, knows exactly what's at stake if President Trump shuts down an Obama administration program that has given work permits and protection from deportation to some 752,000 young undocumented immigrants. In 2012, in her previous job as secretary of Homeland Security, she signed the document — nothing more than a policy memo — that created the program.

So when alarm spread among immigrants on college campuses following Mr. Trump's election, Ms. Napolitano moved quickly to determine what the California system could do to shelter its students if he carried through on his pledges to cancel the program, Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals. The university estimates that almost 3,800 among its 190,000 students are undocumented, many but not all with DACA.

Ms. Napolitano, retaining her law enforcement instincts, does not mention the word "sanctuary" when describing what the university could offer. "Sanctuary is such a vague term, we don't use it," she said crisply.

Instead, the university has published detailed principles of support for undocumented students, including assurances that campus police would not question students solely about their immigration status or join any cooperation agreements with federal immigration authorities under the Trump administration. Through the Davis campus law school, the university is organizing legal help for students detained for deportation.

Another worrisome prospect, Ms. Napolitano said, is that students could lose the permits that allow them to work. Undocumented students, including any losing DACA, will continue to pay in-state tuition and be eligible for state financial aid and for a revolving loan program funded, in part, by the university.

"We want to do everything we can so students are safe on our campuses," Ms. Napolitano said, "so they can focus on what they are there to do, which is to study."

Students at dozens of college campuses, galvanized by Mr. Trump's depictions of immigrants as criminals or potential terrorists, have pressed administrators to provide sanctuary for those without legal papers. But universities have had differing ideas about what that would mean in practice, and most leaders have been careful to say they would not defy the law.

Some institutions have flatly rejected sanctuary plans as encouraging lawbreaking. At New Mexico State University, the president, Garrey Carruthers, said that banning federal agents from campus might imperil its federal funding.

One of the first presidents to declare a sanctuary campus explicitly was Michael S. Roth of Wesleyan, who announced in November that it "will not voluntarily assist" any efforts by federal authorities to deport students. Soon after, John Coatsworth, the provost of Columbia University, said that it would not allow immigration agents on campus without a warrant.

Some administrators point out that student information, including their immigration status, is already protected under long-existing privacy laws requiring the authorities to show a warrant or court order before any data can be released without students' consent.

In Georgia, Emory, which is a private university, considered but ultimately decided against protective measures. "Emory is not seeking to establish itself as a sanctuary campus, for which there is no legal definition," the university said in a Jan. 4 statement. Taking a tougher line, the University of Georgia said that any call for sanctuary was "unacceptable" and added, "We expect our institutions to follow the law."

In his first formal briefing, on Jan. 23, Sean Spicer, the White House press secretary, suggested that canceling DACA would not be a priority for the new administration, but he did not provide any explicit reassurance that the program would continue.

Ms. Napolitano is still contemplating the bitter possibility that Mr. Trump will sweep away her most significant immigration accomplishment. She hopes to persuade him that the program is a good use of executive power, emphasizing that DACA immigrants pose little security risk because they pass background checks to get into the program.

Her message for Mr. Trump: "Why waste resources trying to deport good students who've done everything right?"

School Officials Pledge To Protect Students In The U.S. Illegally

Support swelled after President Trump took executive action.

In the wake of President Donald Trump's executive actions Wednesday, in which he promised to crack down on people in the country illegally and withhold federal funding from so-called sanctuary cities, a tide of school officials struck back, promising to protect such students and their families.

"L.A. Unified does not intend to cooperate with any effort to enforce [the] executive action, or with any other immigration enforcement activity," Los Angeles Unified School Board President Steve Zimmer said in a statement.

"President Trump's executive order on immigration is the single most significant act of mean spiritedness by a president in my lifetime," he said. "I pledge to families today what we have pledged every day since the election: Our schools are safe zones for every child and every family member."

Indeed, just hours after Trump signed the executive orders, the board of the Pittsburgh Public Schools unanimously adopted a resolution declaring itself a "sanctuary" campus. On Thursday, the Clark County School Board, which includes Las Vegas public schools, was set to consider a resolution affirming its ongoing commitment to students regardless of immigration status, which read in part that "the incoming presidential administration could cause a disruption to the safety and security" of students and their families.

And school officials in Eugene, Oregon, planned to meet over the weekend to draft a similar resolution.

In doing so, they join a growing list of places where school officials have made an array of pledges to defend students in the country illegally, ranging from ordering staff not to cooperate with immigration enforcement officials to reaffirming their commitment to the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program.

"I think, given the conversation during President Trump's campaign, his comments raised the anxiety of a lot of our families and children in our schools," says Carolyn Edwards, the trustee board member at Clark County schools who proposed the resolution. "It's clear to me that we need to let our families know that they have a right to be here and we will respect that and honor that and educate every child that comes through our doors."

While there's no official tally, school boards that have passed such resolutions include Los Angeles and Oakland, California; Denver; Minneapolis; Santa Fe, New Mexico; and El Paso, Texas.

San Francisco Unified School District has not passed a resolution, but it blasted an automated phone message to parents after Trump's election, saying it would "continue to uphold San Francisco sanctuary city for all immigrants."

In 2014, approximately 725,000 students who were in the country illegally attended kindergarten through 12th-grade, or 1.3 percent of total enrollment, according to Pew Research Center estimates based on government data. About 3.9 million students were children of parents illegally living in the U.S., a figure that's been on a steady climb since the Great Recession.

Under federal law, public school districts are required to educate all students regardless of their immigration status or their parents' immigration statuses. The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act prohibits school districts from providing third parties, such as the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, information contained in student records.

Declaring oneself a sanctuary school district or adopting a resolution supporting students residing in the country illegally doesn't provide the school or its students any additional legal protections. Indeed, federal law prohibits anyone from intentionally harboring such people from detection.

But the resolutions, school officials say, serve to quell anxiety and assure students and families that they plan to uphold the federal protections that already exist.

"As the Trump administration threatens our students and our way of life, we will double-down on our efforts to protect the right of all students to a public-school education – no matter where they live or where they're from," said Lily Eskelsen Garcia, president of the 3-million-member National Teachers Association, which has been distributing sample resolution language that school boards could choose to adopt.

In addition, a growing number of colleges and universities around the country are following suit – the most high-profile being the University of California system, whose president, Janet Napolitano, released in November a set of principles for supporting students in the U.S. illegally.

Earlier this week, Notre Dame faculty passed a sanctuary campus resolution, and hundreds of students and faculty staged a walkout in support of people illegally residing in the country. The resolution states, in part, that it will not allow Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection or U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services to be on campus for enforcement purposes unless required by a warrant.

Flashback: Dem Mayors Didn't Protest Obama's Attack On 'Sanctuary Cities'

By Paul Bedard

Washington Examiner, January 26, 2017

Democratic mayors and local officials assailing President Trump's threat to cut off funding so-called "sanctuary cities" were silent when former President Obama did the same thing less than a year ago.

In July, Obama's Justice Department, pushed by House Republicans, notified sanctuaries that they would lose some federal funding if they continued to block federal immigration authorities from seizing illegals jailed for crimes.

At the time, Texas Rep. John Culberson, who had pushed Justice to act, told Secrets:

"Today, the DOJ notified local and state law enforcement agencies across America that they will no longer be eligible for federal law enforcement grants unless they certify under oath that their local or state laws do not interfere 'in any way' with requests for immigration information from federal authorities."

In a decision leading to the final action, a top Justice official told Culberson in February that the action was coming. In a letter, Assistant Attorney General Peter J. Kadzik said the department will require over 300 sanctuary cities cities, including Washington, D.C., New York and San Francisco, to abide by immigration laws or see their federal funds cut. If they are found to be in violation of federal laws, as in protecting illegal immigrants, Justice will move in with civil or criminal charges.

In his letter Culberson, Kadzik said that he will advise communities that receive federal money that they are "required to assure and certify that they are in compliance with all applicable federal laws, and will continue to be required to do so."

But either cities didn't believe it or knew the administration wouldn't follow through, no major protests hit the White House. In fact, near the end of his administration, big city Democratic mayors feeling Obama was on their side begged for new protections for illegals.

Mayor Bill de Blasio and 30 other city and county leaders asked Obama to extend executive protections for illegals.

Now he and several other Democratic mayors are threatening to sue Trump who has made a similar threat to cut funding to the cities that block the federal authorities.

Miami-Dade Orders Jails To Comply With 'sanctuary' Counties Crackdown

By Patricia Mazzei

Miami Herald, January 26, 2017

Fearing a loss of millions of dollars for defying immigration authorities, Miami-Dade Mayor Carlos Gimenez on Thursday ordered county jails to comply with federal immigration detention requests — effectively gutting the county's position as a "sanctuary" for immigrants in the country illegally.

Gimenez cited an executive order signed Wednesday by President Donald Trump that threatened to cut federal grants for any counties or cities that don't cooperate fully with Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Since 2013, Miami-Dade has refused to indefinitely detain inmates who are in the country illegally and wanted by ICE — not based on principle, but because the federal government doesn't fully reimburse the county for the expense.

"In light of the provisions of the Executive Order, I direct you and your staff to honor all immigration detainer requests received from the Department of Homeland Security," Gimenez wrote Daniel Junior, the interim director of the corrections and rehabilitation department, in a brief, three-paragraph memo.

Unlike cities like San Francisco, Miami-Dade never declared itself a "sanctuary" and has resisted the label ever since the Justice Department listed the county as one in a May 2016 report. Foreseeing Trump's crackdown on "sanctuary" jurisdictions, the county asked the feds to review its status last year. A decision is still pending.

In an interview with the Miami Herald, Gimenez, a Republican who attended Trump's inauguration last week but said he voted for Hillary Clinton, said he made a financial decision. Last year, the county declined to hold some 100 inmates wanted by the feds. Keeping them in local jails would have cost about $52,000 — a relative drop in the bucket for a county with a total annual budget of $7 billion.

In contrast, the county's 2017 budget shows it's counting on receiving some $355 million in federal funds — money that subsidizes elderly services, beds for the homeless, police officers and other government expenses. It's unclear how much of that comes from the sort of grants Trump has threatened to deny sanctuary municipalities.

"I want to make sure we don't put in jeopardy the millions of funds we get from the federal government for a $52,000 issue," he said. "It doesn't mean that we're going to be arresting more people. It doesn't mean that we're going to be enforcing any immigration laws."

Thursday evening, when this Miami Herald story moved online, Trump posted a response on Twitter:

"Miami-Dade Mayor drops sanctuary policy. Right decision. Strong!"

County Commissioner Sally Heyman, a Democrat who sponsored the 2013 measure that stopped Miami-Dade's compliance with unreimbursed immigration detentions, said she was already working on legislation to undo the county's position so Miami-Dade wouldn't be targeted for federal cuts.

"It's a terrible situation," she said.

Heyman said she met with the feds in December in Washington, and earlier this month in Miami, to try to clarify Miami-Dade's stance. Immigration authorities told her they now have enough facilities to house detainees, so they should be able to pick up inmates from local jails within 48 hours — instead of forcing the county to incur the expense for their prolonged detention.

When cops arrest someone wanted by immigration authorities, the feds ask local jails for the courtesy of holding the detainees long enough for them to pick them up — even if that means keeping the detainees behind bars for longer than the period required for the non-immigration crime they were arrested for.

Heyman said Gimenez's strong-mayor position allows him to direct the corrections department in spite of the commission's 2013 resolution.

Howard Simon, executive director of the Florida chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, denounced Gimenez's action, saying that it "flies in the face of Miami's long history as a city of immigrants" and predicting it will "drive a wedge of distrust between law enforcement and our immigrant community."

"At the very least, a warrant from a court, not merely a request from a federal official, is required to detain somebody in jail," Simon said. "We will resist every attempt by our government to punish immigrants, regardless of their status."

Trump has also ordered the reinstatement of a Bush-era program known as Secure Communities that deputizes local police to enforce immigration laws — a controversial approach that critics say deters victims and witnesses of crime from coming forward. Gimenez noted that while his Thursday memo doesn't deal with that portion of Trump's action, he can't envision cops asking people for their papers.

"The federal government has to do its job," he said. "We don't ask them to write traffic tickets. We don't want police asking people immigration status."

Whether Miami-Dade would be affected by Trump's executive action on sanctuary cities was already questionable, given that there's no legal definition of what constitutes a "sanctuary." The federal law cited in Trump's order addresses jurisdictions that choose not to share information with the feds on immigration cases. No Florida municipality has explicitly set policy to obstruct federal immigration authorities; they've only objected to costly detentions or to detentions without deportation orders or judicial warrants.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Democratic mayors of several big cities that defy federal immigration authorities as a matter of policy declared one after another Wednesday that they protect undocumented immigrants within their jurisdictions.

"I want to be clear: We're going to stay a sanctuary city," Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel said.

"We're going to defend all of our people, regardless of where they come from, regardless of their immigration status," New York Mayor Bill de Blasio said.

First 'Sanctuary City' Caves To Trump Demands

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 26, 2017

MIAMI — President Trump is hailing the first victory in his fight against "sanctuary cities" after a South Florida mayor ordered his employees on Thursday to begin working more closely with federal immigration authorities.

For years, Miami-Dade County has refused to hold some undocumented immigrants in its jails for federal immigration agents. But after Trump signed an executive order threatening to withhold federal funding from sanctuary cities, Miami-Dade County Mayor Carlos Gimenez changed his mind.

Gimenez signed an executive order Thursday ordering the director of his corrections department to begin honoring all requests by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to hold immigration suspects in Miami-Dade County jails.

"Miami-Dade County complies with federal law and intends to fully cooperate with the federal government," the order read.

Gimenez said he made the decision to ensure that the county does not lose out on $355 million in federal funding it has coming in 2017.

Trump was quick to praise the decision, tweeting on Thursday: "Right decision. Strong!"

The term "sanctuary city" is a broad term that describes up to 300 communities that have policies protecting the nation's 11 million undocumented immigrants from deportation.

Some refuse to share any information with ICE agents. Some will share information, but refuse to hold undocumented immigrants for the sole purpose of giving ICE agents time to pick them up.

Trump vowed throughout the campaign to crack down on those cities. He often cited the example of Kate Steinle, a San Francisco woman who was shot and killed by an undocumented immigrant who had been released by the city's sheriff's department.

On Wednesday, Trump signed an executive order that directed the Department of Homeland Security to identify and label "sanctuary cities" in the U.S. It ordered the department to publish a weekly roundup of crimes committed by undocumented immigrants, including any local police departments that had custody of those immigrants but chose to release them.

The order also directed the departments of Justice and Homeland Security to identify federal grants that can be withheld from sanctuary cities that continue their practices. Those federal departments give out millions of dollars in grants each year to help local communities hire police officers, hold undocumented immigrants, improve community policing practices and crack down on violence against women.

"These jurisdictions have caused immeasurable harm to the American people and to the very fabric of our Republic," Trump's order read.

Big city mayors responded forcefully to Trump's order, with mayors from San Francisco to Chicago to New York vowing to fight back. Boston Mayor Marty Walsh said he would even allow undocumented immigrants to seek refuge in city hall.

"They can use my office," Walsh said. "They can use any office in this building."

A collection of police chiefs and sheriffs on Thursday also criticized Trump's attacks on sanctuary cities.

They say the practice of holding suspects in their jails solely for ICE has been ruled unconstitutional by federal courts. And they say the federal government should not try to force cities to carry out the federal responsibility of immigration enforcement.

"Law enforcement has a responsibility to work with federal immigration authorities. And the vast majority of police departments do," said Montgomery County (Md.) Police Chief Tom Manger. "But this notion that the federal government would cut funding to coerce local policies to change is troubling."

Miami-Dade Mayor Ends Sanctuary Status, Citing Trump's Order

By Nikita Vladimirov

The Hill, January 26, 2017

The mayor of Miami-Dade County, Fla., on Thursday ordered his local jails to comply with President Trump's executive order on immigration enforcement in light of the administration's threat to cut funding to places that act as "sanctuaries" for illegal immigrants.

"In light of the provisions of the Executive Order, I direct you and your staff to honor all immigration detainer requests received from the Department of Homeland Security," Mayor Carlos Gimenezwrote in a memo to the interim head of the corrections and rehabilitation department, as reported by the Miami Herald.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

According to the newspaper, the country has never officially called itself a "sanctuary," and has asked the federal government to review its status in 2016.

"Miami-Dade County complies with federal law and intends to fully cooperate with the federal government," Gimenez wrote.

"I will partner with the Board of County Commissioners to address any issues necessary to achieve this end," the mayor added.

Trump tweeted about the decision Thursday night, calling it the "right decision."

Miami-Dade Mayor drops sanctuary policy. Right decision. Strong! https://t.co/MtPvaDC4jM— Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) January 26, 2017

Trump's executive order, which instructs the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to cut funding to "sanctuary" cities and states, may end up costing Miami-Dade millions of dollars, the newspaper notes.

The orders signed on Wednesday also eliminate the "catch and release" policy that returned border-crossers to Mexico rather than detaining and processing them for deportation.

"From here on out, I'm asking all of you to enforce the laws of the United States of America. They will be enforced and enforced strongly," Trump said during his visit to DHS.

"Beginning today, the United States of America gets back control of its borders," he added.

Miami-Dade Mayor Orders Jails To Comply With Federal Immigration Detention Requests

By By Cristiano Lima, Marc Caputo

Politico, January 26, 2017

The mayor of Miami-Dade county on Thursday ordered county jails to comply with federal detention requests, citing President Donald Trump's executive orders concerning "sanctuary jurisdictions" for illegal immigrants.

But in doing so, Miami-Dade Mayor Carlos Gimenez tells POLITICO that the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency needs to start cooperating with the county and paying for the detention of illegal immigrants in one of the nation's largest counties of foreign-born residents.

"If ICE asks us to detain someone we arrested --not for immigration issues because we're not immigration officers-- we feel ICE should pay the bill and bear the responsibility for housing their inmate," Gimenez said.

"There is no change in broader policy," he said. "The change here is we just won't require a letter from ICE for each inmate. But we are not dropping our request to reimburse county taxpayers fairly for aiding the federal government."

Due to ICE's refusal to adequately reimburse the county during President Barack Obama's just-ended term, the county commission in 2013 passed a policy to refuse undocumented-immigrant detainer requests from the federal government. The move earned the county the reputation as a "sanctuary" for illegal immigrants, but Miami-Dade officials and others in the state bristled at the designation .

Gimenez noted that Trump's action to withhold federal funding from "sanctuary jurisdictions" technically didn't apply to the county because the president's order narrowly focused on agencies that violated a federal law that prohibited the obstruction of information requested by immigration officials.

Gimenez said his effort to accommodate Trump would hopefully incentivize his administration to cover the estimated $50,000 cost for housing about 200 inmates annually.

Still, the move essentially ends the county's standing as a "sanctuary" for undocumented immigrants.

Though the county never officially declared itself as a sanctuary, it has effectively served as one since the county's 2013 decision to stop aiding ICE.

"Miami-Dade County complies with federal law and intends to fully cooperate with the federal government," Gimenez wrote in a letter addressed to the county's department of corrections and rehabilitation. "I will partner with the Board of County Commissioners to address any issues necessary to achieve this end."

In all, about seven counties in Florida have refused to detain illegal immigrants due to ICE's actions. Other county sheriffs said they wouldn't detain potential immigrants identified by the agency because ICE's evidence is sometimes wrong and American citizens have been unfairly detained for immigration offenses, leading to lawsuits.

In a speech speech at the Department of Homeland Security on Wednesday, Trump vowed that his executive orders would save lives and "save billions and billions of dollars."

"For too long your office's agents haven't been allowed to properly do their jobs," Trump said. "You know that, right? Do you know that? Absolutely. But that's all about to change."

Trump added: "By working together, safe borders and economic cooperation, I truly believe we can enhance the relation between our two nations, to a degree not seen before, certainly, in a very, very long time. I think our relationship with Mexico is going to get better."

Onondaga County Sheriff: Feds Haven't Asked For Immigrant Detention On His Watch

By Mark Weiner

Syracuse (NY) Post-Standard, January 26, 2017

SYRACUSE, N.Y. – President Donald Trump's executive orders that threaten to punish communities harboring undocumented immigrants appear unlikely to be put to the test any time soon in Onondaga County.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Onondaga County Sheriff Gene Conway said today he has never received a request from federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials to detain an undocumented immigrant during his two years in office.

If he did receive such a "detainer request" from ICE, Conway said, he is likely to comply with federal authorities. A detainer request, also known as an immigration hold, is a request to local law enforcement to detain a non-citizen so that ICE can take custody of the person.

"It has always been my purpose to cooperate with law enforcement, whether it is local, state or federal," Conway told Syracuse.com.

Conway oversees the Onondaga County Justice Center jail, where about 10,000 people a year are held after being charged by Syracuse police or Onondaga County deputies. He said the charges faced by those at the jail are usually more serious than immigration violations.

"I would have to think that the situation here would be the result of someone allegedly committing a crime, and not so much the crime of being an illegal immigrant," Conway said.

He said his own deputies will not question people about their immigration or citizenship status.

"To just go out and be looking for illegal immigrants is not something we have done here, or something I intend to do," Conway said.

The issue of undocumented immigrants and local law enforcement boiled over this week when Trump signed an executive order allowing federal intervention in the way that local and state officials carry out policing and treat immigrants.

Trump told the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to find ways to cut off federal funding for so-called "sanctuary cities" that refuse to turn over undocumented immigrants to the federal government.

Mayor Stephanie Miner recently declared that Syracuse would be a sanctuary city. But the decision about how to handle undocumented immigrants in law enforcement custody appears to be out her hands.

Conway oversees the jail, and the Onondaga County Correctional Facility in Jamesville is overseen by the county.

An assistant to Onondaga County Corrections Commissioner William J. Hanna III referred questions today to a spokesman for County Executive Joanie Mahoney, who had no immediate comment about the undocumented immigrant detention policy.

Separately, data compiled by researchers at Syracuse University found ICE has issued 110 "detainer requests" since 2007 for prisoners held in Onondaga County.

Of those requests, ICE was given custody of the prisoner in 47 of the cases since 2007, according to the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University, which gathers and produces research reports on government data.

Maryland's Howard County Could Become Official Sanctuary

By Talia Richman

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON (AP) – Two Howard County Council members plan to push forward with legislation to declare their county a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants, even after President Donald Trump announced his intention to crack down on such jurisdictions.

Fulfilling one of many immigration-related campaign promises, Trump on Wednesday signed an executive order that will cut federal funding from localities that don't cooperate with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The Howard County Council still is expected to vote as early as Feb. 6 on a bill that would designate Howard County a "sanctuary county."

The proposed legislation, co-sponsored by Councilman Calvin Ball and Councilwoman Jen Terrasa, would mostly codify practices Howard County already employs with regard to undocumented immigrants. It would ban county employees – including police officers and elected officials – from enforcing federal immigration law, assisting immigration officers in gathering information, and inquiring into people's immigration status.

The legislation also states the policy would not apply if it was in conflict with federal law.

With Trump's threat looming, Ball said the bill is even more important than before.

"Given the fear and concern in our community from undocumented immigrants, our friends, our neighbors…this is a vital community conversation to have at this point in time," he said. "We're at a crossroads. We have to decide what kind of community we're going to be."

And although the bill doesn't represent dramatic changes in policy, Ball said there is value in having a "written policy that people can see and does not change without a public, transparent process."

County Executive Allan Kittleman called the legislation a "hollow political statement" and said he would use his veto power should it pass.

"I am not willing to jeopardize existing programs and services which benefit all Howard County residents to adopt a label that would not change any of the policies and practices that we already have in place," Kittleman said in a statement

The bill could also "compromise public safety efforts," he said, as the county has had success working with ICE to target drug activity, human trafficking and child pornography.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ball said it is unclear if Trump's executive order would already impact the county, given the policies currently in practice.

With many questions still unanswered, Ball said the council is working to evaluate the executive order's implications, adding that Howard County does not receive "significant federal funding."

In two public hearings since the bill was introduced Jan. 3, residents have come forward on both sides of the issue.

"It has really blown away the usual input we get from the public," said county council public information officer Eric Solomon, noting that one hearing went until the early hours of the morning.

Those opposed expressed fear that the "sanctuary" designation would negatively affect the economy and lead to higher crime rates. Some cited the case of Kate Steinle, a woman who was killed in 2015 by an undocumented immigrant in San Francisco, a sanctuary city.

Trump ordered his administration to "make public a comprehensive list of criminal actions committed by aliens and any jurisdiction that ignored or otherwise failed to honor any detainers with respect to such aliens."

The Center for American Progress released a report Thursday that found there are an average of 35.5 fewer crimes committed per 10,000 people in sanctuary counties as opposed to non-sanctuary counties.

Howard County residents who testified in favor of the bill urged council members to affirm their values of inclusion.

A spokeswoman for immigrant advocacy group CASA said Howard County council members should continue their fight to become a "sanctuary county."

"They should stand on their strong principles," said Fernanda Durand, "their principles that are about compassion and keeping their cities safe."

Las Vegas-area School District Taking Up Sanctuary Question

Fox News, January 26, 2017

LAS VEGAS – School trustees in Las Vegas, where almost half the students are Hispanic, are being asked to declare an immigration safe haven for students regardless of their citizenship status.

Clark County School District board member Carolyn Edwards is proposing a resolution on Thursday that she calls a response to President Donald Trump's promises to deport people living in the U.S. without legal permission.

Edwards says she doesn't know how the other six other board members will vote.

She says she wants to reinforce protections for children of immigrants under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals order that former President Barack Obama signed at a Las Vegas high school in November 2014.

The fifth-largest public school district in the U.S. reports that 46 percent of its 322,000 students are of Hispanic heritage.

Snyder: Immigration Isn't 'primary' Function Of Local Police

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

LANSING, Mich. (AP) – Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder says he doesn't think a primary function of state and local police is to act as immigration officers.

President Donald Trump's executive action on immigration instructs the Homeland Security secretary to engage with governors and local officials about agreements under which local law enforcement officials could investigate, apprehend and detain people in the country illegally.

Snyder told reporters Thursday he doesn't view immigration enforcement as one of the "primary" functions for state and local police.

The president is also expected to soon take steps to restrict the flow of refugees into the United States.

Snyder says Trump "has to make those decisions" because it's not a state responsibility, but regardless of national immigration policies, he will "continue to promote Michigan as a welcoming place for immigrants."

Iowa City Officials: Immigration Order Shouldn't Affect City

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

IOWA CITY, Iowa (AP) – Iowa City officials say they don't think the city will lose funding despite President Donald Trump's move to cut federal funds to jurisdictions that don't cooperate in enforcing federal immigration laws.

The City Council adopted a policy last week saying the city won't enforce federal immigration law or commit local resources toward doing so, with some exceptions, the Iowa City Press-Citizen (http://icp-c.com/2koQia3) reported. The council's decision came after it declined to pursue a "sanctuary city" label.

Trump's order calls on the government to withhold federal grants and funding for "sanctuary cities," and gives the Secretary of Homeland Security discretion to designate any jurisdiction as such.

Trump's order cites a section of federal law that makes it illegal for federal, state and local government entities to prohibit sending or receiving an individual's immigration status to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service. Iowa City's new policy states that city employees won't be restricted in communicating with federal immigration authorities.

City Attorney Eleanor Dilkes said the city's federal funding shouldn't be in jeopardy.

"If you look at the executive order, the only thing that gives me some pause is that the director of office and management and budget is directed to obtain and provide relevant information on all federal grant money that currently is received by any 'sanctuary jurisdiction,'" she said. "In terms of the specific Section 9, that is saying they want to ensure that states and political subdivisions comply with that section of the code, I can confidently say we do."

Iowa City's annual financial report shows it received more than $18 million in federal grants in fiscal year 2016. More than $213,000 came from U.S. Department of Justice grants.

Iowa City's policy includes exceptions for public safety threats, violent offenders or situations in which cooperation with ICE is necessary to protect the public.

Connecticut Ready To Fight Trump's Immigration Policy

By Francesca Kefalas

Norwich (CT) Bulletin, January 26, 2017

Windham finds itself openly at odds with President Donald Trump a day after he signed two executive orders outlining his immigration policy.

In fact, all of Connecticut, with its policy of not turning over all undocumented aliens requested by federal officials, is likely to be in the crosshairs of Trump's new immigration policy.

With a stroke of the pen, Trump is trying to do what some Republicans in the last Congress were not able to do – punish "sanctuary" cities and states by withholding federal funds.

The Windham Town Council voted to become a Sanctuary City Jan. 17. The resolution states the town does not intend to violate federal law. But it also states that no employee — which would include the Willimantic fire department and police department — elected leader or appointed official is to ask about a person's immigration status unless it is warranted as part of a criminal investigation.

"I'm of course concerned," Town Councilor Dennis O'Brien, who put forward the resolution, said of Trump's actions. "Our resolution simply follows the law of the land, the law of the United State's Constitution, federal immigration law and the state's Trust Act. I'm concerned about what's happening but I'm also very proud of what we've done."

The town also held a pro-immigration rally at Jillson Square on Jan. 20 attended by nearly 200 people.

The term sanctuary – given to about 300 jurisdictions in the United States – is used to describe a wide range of policies, none of which actually protect an undocumented worker from deportation if federal law enforcement officials have him or her in custody.

San Francisco, Chicago, New York and other American cities have enacted policies limiting cooperation with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Other jurisdictions more narrowly restrict police from inquiring about the immigration status of detained suspects.

Hartford, Willimantic and New Haven are among dozens of cities with police departments that have established policies of not asking the immigration status of those they arrest or detain.

Connecticut in 2013 passed the "Trust Act" that allows state and local law enforcement agencies to ignore a federal "detainer," a request to hold an undocumented resident for immigration officials, if he or she hasn't committed a serious felony.

On Tuesday, Gov. Dannel P. Malloy said, "We don't actually have any true sanctuary cities in Connecticut."

"The president is bound by the Constitution of the United States, just as we are bound by the Constitution of the United States, and an executive order does not trump the Constitution of the United States," Malloy said. "If this order is written in such a way as to discriminate against individuals or communities or institutions, we'll defend that."

To Trump, Connecticut and its "sanctuary" cities are breaking the law.

"We are going to restore the rule of law in the United States," Trump said, addressing Department of Homeland Security employees after signing the directives. "Beginning today the United States gets control of its borders."

But Trump did not specify what federal funds would be withheld from jurisdictions determined to be "sanctuaries."

His executive order says the new Secretary of Homeland Security, John F. Kelly will use "the Declined Detainer Outcome Report or its equivalent and, on a weekly basis, make public a comprehensive list of criminal actions committed by aliens and any jurisdiction that ignored or otherwise failed to honor any detainers with respect to such aliens."

The Director of the Office of Management and Budget would then investigate and detail all federal grant money received "by any sanctuary jurisdiction," Trump's order said. Those jurisdictions would be stripped of federal funds, "except as mandated by law."

Windham Town Councilor James Flores said he believes this is an issue that will end up before the U.S.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Supreme Court. Flores said Windham and the state need to see how the issue unfolds but he believes the town's commitment to its undocumented immigrants is strong.

"We will continue to fight," Flores said.

Flores said the majority of the undocumented immigrants are good citizens and taxpayers doing important jobs in the community.

O'Brien said Windham was built by immigrants and its success as a textile city in the 1900s was due to immigrants.

"I hear people say those immigrants were here legally, but it was not the same process then to come into this country," O'Brien said. "We've always been a country of immigrants."

The concern for immigrants is compounded in Windham, which is also home to Eastern Connecticut State University, which has almost 50 Dreamer students. Dreamers are students who have taken advantage of President Barack Obama's executive order called the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals. With it Obama directed ICE and other federal agencies involved in apprehending and deporting the undocumented to practice "prosecutorial discretion" with those who immigrated to the United States as children and were in the country without legal status.

Eastern has 47 Dreamers. College President Elsa Nunez said at the immigration rally that she is an immigrant and she plans to keep her students safe.

"We're going to stay together as long as we have to make sure the rights of these students are protected," Nunez said. "This country was built on the backs of immigrants, so why now are you starting to say somehow immigrants are not welcome in this country or they're not taking their place in this country?"

Nunez said 36 of the 47 students have a grade point average of 3.5 or higher.

"These are very smart students," Nunez said. "They're going to be doctors, lawyers, lead community-based organizations in this country. They will make us proud."

Amy Vas Nunes said she was involved in the organizational meetings for the rally and knows there will be more. Nunes said she believes Trump's actions are going to spur more and more people to action. Nunes said she is concerned because she is reminded of what happened to her family during World War II, some of whom were Dutch Jews living in the Netherlands.

"People were exterminated," Nunes said. "So I'm very concerned about anything that starts down that Nazism road. I'm very sensitive to anything anti-Semitic, anti-Muslim, anti-pick-your-people. We can't let that happen."

State Attorney General George Jepsen said he is trying to determine if and how Trump's actions would affect the state.

"My staff is reviewing the executive order and gathering other information, and so we are not in a position to comment in detail at this time," Jepsen said. "I remain committed to taking action within my authority to protect Connecticut residents whose rights are threatened by this or other actions of the Trump Administration."

The issue of whether jurisdictions that don't comply with federal detainers are breaking the law is subject to conflicting legal interpretations.

The Justice Department ruled last summer that local law enforcement agencies are required by federal law to at least share information about illegal immigrants. But the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled in 2014 that local police departments are not required to hold undocumented immigrants for ICE.

'Worst kind of prejudice'

An attempt to pass a law that would strip federal law enforcement money from jurisdictions that don't share all information about undocumented aliens stopped or arrested by law enforcement faltered in the Senate in the last Congress.

That legislation would have put as much as $20 million in annual federal policing grants for Connecticut in jeopardy. Most of that money, more than $15 million, comes in the form of Community Development Block Grants.

If Trump wants to broaden the reach of his executive order, he'll need legislation like the bills several GOP lawmakers, including Rep. Duncan Hunter of California and Sen. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania, have tried to push through Congress.

Trump's executive orders also pressed jurisdictions to enter into memorandums of understanding with the federal government that would allow local police to enforce immigration law.

They also called for building a border wall with Mexico, hiring 10,000 additional border patrol agents and building more detention centers, all projects that would need authorization and appropriations from Congress.

Connecticut's Democratic lawmakers blasted Trump's proposals, calling for a comprehensive immigration bill instead.

"Public safety is critically important, but these actions detract from valid and vital law enforcement efforts instead of enhancing them," Sen. Richard Blumenthal said. "Local law enforcement needs the funding that President Trump's orders would cut and divert to a politically motivated show project."

Sen. Chris Murphy said, "President Trump's divisive policies that build walls and take money away from local police do nothing to make us safer.

"America's greatness is rooted in our immigrant history, and those who try to turn our country against immigrants are preying on the worst kind of prejudice," Murphy said.

Rep. Elizabeth Esty, D-5th District, said, "What President Trump offered today are not solutions.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"Nothing the president did today will make us safer, grow our economy, or fix our broken immigration system. These actions are political gimmicks that will serve only to harass and tear apart law-abiding families," she said.

State Dems Pledge To Fight Trump Immigration Order

By Reid Wilson

The Hill, January 26, 2017

Democratic legislators and attorneys general are promising swift pushback against two executive orders President Trump signed Wednesday aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration.

One of the orders, which Trump signed during a visit to the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), would put at risk federal grants to cities and counties that act as "sanctuary cities" — jurisdictions that refuse to comply with federal authorities' requests to hold some suspects while their immigration status is checked.

Another order would allow the DHS to begin construction of a wall along the southern border with Mexico. Trump also laid out plans to hire 5,000 new Border Patrol agents and 10,000 immigration officers.

The two orders, fulfilling Trump's campaign pledges to crack down on both legal and illegal immigration, drew swift condemnation from Democratic-led states with significant immigrant populations. Several attorneys general pledged to sue the administration over what they called illegal acts.

"The president lacks the constitutional authority to cut off funding to states and cities simply because they have lawfully acted to protect immigrant families," said Eric Schneiderman (D), New York's attorney general.

Schneiderman's office last week issued legal guidance to local governments in New York that laid out their rights to refuse immigration warrants issued by the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement or Customs and Border Protection agencies.

In California, Attorney General Xavier Becerra — sworn in to office just days ago — said his office would defend two state laws that allow local jurisdictions to ignore federal immigration orders.

"Executive orders do not change existing law. Executive orders cannot contradict existing law. And executive orders can be challenged for violating constitutional and legal standards in their enforcement," Becerra said in a statement.

California Assembly Speaker Anthony Rendon (D) said the state legislature would rely on its new legal counsel, former Attorney General Eric Holder, to guard against what Rendon called an overly vague order.

"The language is so broad that mass deportations are likely without real due process," Rendon said. "Our agricultural industry and other economic sectors, businesses large and small, depend on an immigrant workforce. If those businesses suffer, the national economy will suffer too, and that's all on Trump."

Washington Attorney General Bob Ferguson (D) said Trump's order "raises significant legal issues that my office will be investigating closely."

The early pledges of action from Democratic legislators and legal officers presages what is likely to be a concerted effort by blue states to tie the Trump administration up in court. Democratic officials have said they will fight the Trump administration on everything from immigration to climate change to repealing the Affordable Care Act, another key element of the president's agenda.

"You could call us a bulwark against Trumpism. You could call us a beacon of light in darkness. You could call us a sanctuary for a variety of people who might be otherwise victims of instability that comes out of the White House," Washington Gov. Jay Inslee (D) said in a recent interview. "I think all of those things fit. We do intend to work in concert as much as we can."

Why Police Worry About Trump's 'Sanctuary Cities' Crackdown

By Patrik Jonsson

Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2017

January 26, 2017 —President Trump on Wednesday essentially told police nationwide to start looking for undocumented immigrants and reporting them to federal immigration authorities for deportation.

On Thursday, Capt. Jeff Scroggin, a spokesman for the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department gave Mr. Trump a simple reply: No.

Enforcing federal immigration law "is just not what we do, which is why our policy will not change, even with the new Trump executive action," says Captain Scroggin, a 32-year veteran, in an interview with the Monitor.

Scroggin's view – which is supported by California's attorney general – is pitting hard-earned policing knowledge and wisdom against Trump's effort to crack down on "sanctuary cities." In an executive order signed Wednesday, the president said cities would risk losing federal money if they didn't commit their police to enforcing federal immigration laws.

But for many police officers, the executive order points down worrisome paths.

On one hand, they say, public safety increases when trust in police rises. Using local cops as immigration agents, they say, would shut the door on vast communities of immigrants, creating more opportunity for criminal activity, not less.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

What's more, they add, police are already being asked to do too much – adding immigration enforcement would only stretch them further.

Over both these concerns looms a fraught legal question: Should the government be able to essentially commandeer local police as federal agents? Some municipalities are already voluntarily enforcing federal immigration law, but Trump's executive order would impose huge costs on those who don't comply – challenging the rights of states and localities to set their own priorities.

For that reason and others, "Trump will face massive political resistance and challenges in the courts," said Ingrid Eagly, a professor at the University of California at Los Angeles School of Law, in The New York Times.

The executive order directed the Homeland Security secretary to work with localities and states to enforce immigration law. Those that do not comply can be designated "sanctuary jurisdictions" and have their federal grants blocked.

Like many conservatives, Trump says undocumented immigrants with rap sheets are a fundamental threat to public safety, and sanctuary cities – which vow not to share immigration information with the federal government – are complicit.

"Sanctuary city policies are dangerous to citizens who are lawfully in this country," Louisiana Attorney General Jeff Landry said, according to NBC News.

But numerous studies suggest undocumented immigrants are no more violent or unlawful as a group than US citizens are.

Caught in the middle are officers like Scroggin, who see the prospect of doing federal immigration work as antithetical to their vow of duty.

"We're the melting pot of the world out here in California, there are a lot of immigrant communities that we serve, so we need to make sure that they feel comfortable" calling the cops for help, he says. "The most important thing we strive to do is to build enough trust so that residents provide information that makes this community safer. It's a team effort."

Most US police departments agree. Moreover, they suggest that many police departments already cooperate with the federal government. Even in sanctuary cities, police often notify federal authorities when they have an undocumented person in custody who has committed serious crimes.

The concern is that the executive order will remove police departments' ability to focus on what they think is most important.

"Police leaders across the country are aligned on this issue," Seattle Police Chief Kathleen O'Toole told NBC News.

At this point, it's not clear how much Trump could back up his threats. The president does hold sway over some grants but cannot redirect funding directly approved by Congress.

By one estimate, New York City could face $7 billion in federal losses if the city refuses Trump's order. Or Trump could withdraw only funds that are attached to the federal immigration mission – a minuscule amount, by comparison.

Even Scroggin acknowledges that enforcement priorities in places like New York City and Los Angeles County could change if President Trump is able to hold back billions of federal dollars. But others say the issue is not just about punishing sanctuary cities but also persuading others not to join their ranks.

"This is not just a legal battle or a law enforcement issue – to a large extent it's political, too," said Jessica Vaughan of the Center for Immigration Studies, a think tank that favors protectionist immigration measures, to the Orange County Register. "The goal is not to go around whacking sanctuary cities. It's to identify funding that can be cut off so that cities might be dissuaded from adopting those policies."

Contrary To Trump's Claims, Immigrants Are Less Likely To Commit Crimes

By Richard Pérez-Peña

New York Times, January 26, 2017

A central point of an executive order President Trump signed on Wednesday — and a mainstay of his campaign speeches — is the view that undocumented immigrants pose a threat to public safety.

But several studies, over many years, have concluded that immigrants are less likely to commit crimes than people born in the United States. And experts say the available evidence does not support the idea that undocumented immigrants commit a disproportionate share of crime.

"There's no way I can mess with the numbers to get a different conclusion," said Alex Nowrasteh, immigration policy analyst at the libertarian Cato Institute, which advocates more liberal immigration laws.

Mr. Trump often cites specific cases of undocumented immigrants committing or being charged with crimes, like the 2015 killing in San Francisco of Kathryn Steinle, whose accused killer had repeatedly been convicted of crimes and deported, yet slipped back into the United States.

His executive order states that many people who enter the country illegally "present a significant threat to national security and public safety." It directs the Department of Homeland Security to publish a weekly "comprehensive list of criminal actions committed by aliens and any jurisdiction that ignored or otherwise failed to honor any detainers with respect to such aliens."

Analyses of census data from 1980 through 2010 show that among men ages 18 to 49, immigrants were one-half to one-fifth as likely to be incarcerated as those born in the

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

United States. Across all ages and sexes, about 7 percent of the nation's population are noncitizens, while figures from the Justice Department show that about 5 percent of inmates in state and federal prisons are noncitizens.

Opponents of immigration often point out that in federal prisons, a much higher share of inmates, 22 percent, are noncitizens. But federal prisons hold a small fraction of the nation's inmates, and in many ways, it is an unusual population. About one-third of noncitizen federal inmates are serving time for immigration offenses — usually re-entering the country illegally after being deported — that are not covered by state law.

With about 43 million foreign-born people living in the country, and about 11 million of them here illegally, immigrants are a large slice of the population, and are no doubt to blame for a large share of the crime. The Department of Homeland Security has estimated that 1.9 million noncitizens living in the United States — whether legally or illegally — have been convicted of criminal offenses and could be deported. The Migration Policy Institute, a research group that does not advocate immigration policies, estimated that 820,000 of those people were in the country illegally, including 300,000 with felony convictions.

"The tone and tenor of the president's executive order blurs the line between who's a serious criminal and who isn't," and between documented and undocumented immigrants, said Randy Capps, the institute's director of research for United States programs. There is no national accounting of criminality specifically by people who are in the country illegally. But Mr. Nowrasteh said he had analyzed the available figures and concluded that undocumented immigrants had crime rates somewhat higher than those here legally, but much lower than those of citizens.

Immigrants Train To Defend Themselves, Families In Trump Era

NBC News, January 26, 2017

While President Donald Trump dedicated his inauguration speech last week to the "forgotten men and women" of the United States, another group of forgotten people in small towns and big cities across America prepared to defend their families, friends and neighbors from policy changes that could put them at high risk for deportation.

"Divide into two groups," instructs Ravi Ragbir, executive director of the New Sanctuary Movement Coalition—an immigrant rights group based in New York City. "Do you want to be an ICE agent? Or an immigrant?"

Every Thursday evening, a small group of undocumented immigrants gathers in a church in downtown Manhattan — which they call a "safe space" — to share their stories, get legal advice, and role-play real life detentions.

On this particular evening, the support group plays out the story of a green card holder who was detained by immigration agents outside of a New York City homeless shelter five days before his second son was born in 2014.

"We are preparing them to defend their rights against possible raids during the Trump administration," Ragbir told NBC Latino. "Role-playing is very important because it becomes automatic, it mentalizes people for when they are intercepted or accosted by agents. And unless you are doing this regularly, you become shocked and traumatized."

Trump signed an executive order on Wednesday that will direct federal funding to building a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border. Its one in a series of actions aimed at cracking down on immigration.

On Inauguration Day, the president also got moral support from a Southern Baptist pastor, the Rev. Robert Jeffress, who compared Trump's intended immigration and infrastructure policies with the biblical story of the builder Nehemiah — chosen by God to build a wall around Jerusalem for the protection of its citizens.

But for other religious leaders, Jeffress' inauguration sermon contradicts the communal spirit of God.

"God characterizes our religious traditions with compassion," said Juan Carlos Ruiz, a Mexican priest and co-founder of the New Sanctuary Movement in New York. "God is welcoming and calls on us to build bridges, not walls."

The New Sanctuary Movement Coalition holds a workshop in a church where participants role play immigration arrest scenarios to learn what their rights are and how to express them. The January 2017 workshop have become more urgent as President Donald Trump has signed executive orders ramping up immigration enforcement. New Sanctuary Movement Coaliton / New Sanctuary Movement Coalitio

For Ruiz, and other immigration rights advocates, walls divide people into insiders and outsiders, natives and immigrants. And these divisions, the Mexican priest emphasized, can underpin hate and distrust.

"We cannot protect ourselves with an ideology of hatred towards others," Ruiz told NBC Latino. "We cannot confine ourselves with an us vs. them mentality because it denies humanity. And immigration is a global crisis that prevents us from seeing the humanity of others."

While immigrants are often characterized as loners, outsiders, who bounce from job to job and place to place like cowboys (and cowgirls) on a frontier, New Sanctuary Movement organizers remind immigrants that they are not alone, that immigrants are like trees with deep roots planted in American families, parishes and communities. And these roots can empower them to strengthen their faith and defend their rights.

"We cannot wait for politicians alone to decide our rights," said an undocumented Mexican mother with

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

American-born children who attended a New Sanctuary meeting. "We are transnational families. We come here to work. We help build up our communities. And we need to work with our communities to become a solution."

Trump To Publicize Crimes By Illegal Immigrants In 'sanctuary Cities'

New York Post, January 26, 2017

President Trump plans to publish a weekly list of crimes committed by illegal immigrants in the Big Apple and all other sanctuary cities that do not cooperate with federal immigration authorities.

The list will inform citizens and others about "public safety threats associated with sanctuary" cities, according to an executive order Trump signed Wednesday.

"The [Homeland Security] Secretary shall utilize the Declined Detainer Outcome Report or its equivalent and, on a weekly basis, make public a comprehensive list of criminal actions committed by aliens and any jurisdiction that ignored or otherwise failed to honor any detainers with respect to such aliens," the order said.

Mayor de Blasio said that New York — one of about 300 sanctuary cities across the US — would not change it's policy in the face of Trump's threat to withhold federal funding from cities that do not play ball with his order.

The NYPD said Wednesday the city has a list of roughly 170 criminal offenses that are not covered by the sanctuary policy, and that the department notifies the feds when illegal immigrants are charged with those crimes.

The list includes serious crimes such as felony assault, rape, murder and terrorism as well as gun smuggling and witness tampering.

Dreamers Watch As The Trump Assault Begins

By Dorothy Wickenden

The New Yorker, January 26, 2017

The executive orders rain down like tweets now from the Oval Office. Some are nearly as gestural, as off the wall, as the ravings of @realDonaldTrump. Even congressional Republicans are unbriefed, caught by surprise by some of the edicts issued daily, or more than daily, by President Donald Trump. That was the case on Wednesday, when a flurry of executive orders announced the elements of an immigration crackdown: construction of the much promised southern border wall, a vast increase in enforcement agents and detention facilities, a federal assault on the hundreds of American cities that have declined to act as immigration police. This failure to consult, not only with political allies but with the relevant government agencies, or legal specialists, or experts of any sort, is what makes some of the orders seem slight and unrealistic. Obamacare shall be abolished, details to come. The executive orders are reportedly being written by a pair of White House aides, Steve Bannon and Stephen Miller, who also wrote Trump's painful Inaugural Address. Miller became known during the campaign for whipping up crowds with the chant "Build the wall!" Bannon is the former editor of the far-right Web site Breitbart News.

At the same time, there are areas of policy where the executive can have a large and immediate effect. Syrian refugees can and will be turned away, starting now, in their thousands. Aid to women's-health programs in developing countries can and will be blocked. Environmentally ruinous oil-pipeline projects can be revived, coal leasing on public lands resumed. The honor of the United States can be tarnished by dirty dealing. These initiatives don't have to wait on congressional funding. Illegal immigration, Trump's signature issue as a candidate, insofar as he ran on conventional issues, is different. It's an enormous, unwieldy problem, far more easily demagogued than solved. And yet there were Obama executive orders, promulgated in lieu of comprehensive reform legislation that was desperately needed but never passed, which Trump could now reverse, notably the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program.

DACA gives, in two-year renewable installments, relief from the threat of deportation to young undocumented immigrants who were brought to the United States as children. Applicants are closely vetted. They must have lived in the United States since 2007, be enrolled in school or recent graduates, and have no serious criminal record. More than seven hundred and fifty thousand young people, known as Dreamers, have been accepted to the program. They are able to work legally, get a driver's license, apply for scholarships. In the states that allow it, they qualify for in-state college tuition. Trump, during his campaign, promised to cancel DACA.

Some of Trump's supporters have been outraged by each passing day of his Presidency in which DACA has not been eliminated. They calculate that, between renewals and new applications, eight hundred more "illegals" are receiving DACA protection every day. The delay in cancelling the program has been called "already a betrayal" on the popular RedState blog. Breitbart News suspects "Chamber of Commerce Republicans in Trump's White House—led by Chief of Staff Reince Priebus," in league with House Speaker Paul Ryan, of pushing some cheap-foreign-labor agenda forward. Anti-immigrant activists have expressed fears that pro-business globalists are getting the better of the Bannon nationalist faction on this defining issue. And Preibus, asked on Fox News, on Sunday, about eliminating DACA, took a notably unrushed line, saying, "I think we're going to work with House and Senate leadership, as well as to get a long-term solution on that issue." Trump himself, for that matter, intimated to Time, in December, after the magazine made him its Person of the Year, that he viewed the Dreamers benignly. “We’re going to work something out that’s going to make people happy and proud,” he said. “They got brought here at a very young age, they’ve worked here, they’ve gone to school here. Some were good students. Some have wonderful jobs. And they’re in never-never land because they don’t know what’s going to happen.”

Senator Jeff Sessions, Trump’s nominee for Attorney General, is a staunch opponent of DACA—and of immigration generally, both legal and illegal. In 2014, Sessions pushed, unsuccessfully, for a vote on legislation, passed by the House, to kill DACA. He has worked against nearly every immigration-reform measure in the Senate in the past twenty years, and in 2013 he led the fight against a bipartisan comprehensive reform bill that President Barack Obama was eager to sign. Earlier this month, at a Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearing, Sessions called the executive order that created DACA “very questionable, in my opinion, constitutionally.” Sessions, who will most likely be confirmed, was the first senator to endorse Donald Trump during the Republican primaries. They bonded as immigration hard-liners. Stephen Miller, the mob rouser, worked for Sessions before he went to work for Trump. Sessions told Politico, “A Trump victory means that we will, I think, in [a] rather short period of time, end the lawlessness at the border and will bring the country around to what I think a substantial majority favor.” In fact, according to a recent poll, a substantial majority of Americans favors the continued existence of DACA.

But those are not the folks who elected Trump. And Trump’s decision-making, as we have come to learn, is fickle, indifferent to fact, and easily swayed. For example, his insistence, somehow both dogged and wild-eyed, that he lost the popular vote to Hillary Clinton only because three to five million people voted illegally—every one of them against him—took several bizarre turns this week. When asked, at a closed-door meeting with congressional leaders on Monday, for evidence for his extraordinary claim, he reportedly cited Bernhard Langer, the “very famous” German golfer. His friend Langer, Trump said, had told him about waiting in a line in Florida to vote, and then being turned away. Meanwhile, there were Latinos on either side of him who, Trump said, didn’t look as if they ought to be allowed to vote—this was according to three staff members who were at the meeting, and were interviewed by the Times—and yet they cast provisional ballots. Priebus quickly changed the subject. The story leaked out, however, causing Langer’s daughter, Christina, to point out, when reached by the Times, that her father is a German citizen, cannot vote in the United States, and is not, in fact, friends with President Trump.

As if this were not mortifying enough, Trump, after hearing a reporter tell his press secretary that fraud on such a scale would seem to merit a major investigation, vowed, naturally, to launch a major investigation. The President’s aides have since tried to muddy the water—it wasn’t really Langer who was trying to vote, it was Langer’s friend—but nothing makes it any better. Trump’s thinking is, from all appearances, frighteningly disordered. He is not talking nonsense to distract us, the public, from some other topic, or to keep the spotlight on him. The spotlight is on him. He is simply talking nonsense, and he is doing so in the service of—or, perhaps, in the throes of—yet another narcissistic fantasy.

From the perspective of undocumented immigrants generally, it is unfortunate that Trump has settled on them as the main agents of this historic voter fraud. The association can only further prejudice the President and certain of his followers against them. For the Dreamers, there may still be hope that the sympathetic benevolence he expressed toward them last month does not change—does not go south after, say, a conversation with Jeff Sessions, or a TV news story that strikes Trump wrong somehow. The Times published a remarkable story this week about the President’s impulsive decision-making. It tracked his habits and measured his reaction time. The number of minutes between the end of Bill O’Reilly’s show on Fox News on Tuesday night, after a segment about violence in Chicago, and Trump’s Twitter post declaring, “I will send in the Feds!”? Twenty-five. The time between a Fox News morning report in November, after the election, about college students burning an American flag and Trump’s tweet saying “Nobody should be allowed to burn the American flag—if they do, there must be consequences—perhaps loss of citizenship or year in jail!”? Thirty minutes exactly. We are not all as vulnerable as the Dreamers in this moment. But we are all caught in this moment.

Police Divided Over Trump’s ‘Sanctuary City’ Order

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 26, 2017

WASHINGTON — National law enforcement groups are sharply divided over President Trump’s plan to crack down on sanctuary cities that shield illegal immigrants from deportation, as some warn that law enforcement’s already fraught relationship with minority communities could be further damaged by pressing local officers to enforce immigration laws.

Central to Trump’s order aimed at up to 300 communities that maintain policies protecting the undocumented is a threat to withhold federal money from cities that do not comply with federal immigration enforcement efforts. Although the order contains a provision that could allow funding to continue to flow to local police, pending approval by the attorney general, some law enforcement and municipal authorities described the action as akin to unlawful “coercion.”

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"Local police departments work hard to build and preserve trust with all of the communities they serve, including immigrant communities,'' a joint statement issued by the Major Cities Chiefs Association and the U.S. Conference of Mayors said. "Immigrants residing in our cities must be able to trust the police and all of the city government.''

It is not the first time the chiefs' group, a coalition of top police officials representing the largest agencies in the country, has counseled against expanding local police responsibilities to include immigration enforcement.

Four years ago, the group issued its own "immigration policy paper'' warning that local officers lacked basic resources, training and "clear authority'' to assist in such matters.

"Immigration laws are very complex and the training required to understand them significantly detracts from the core mission of local police to create safe communities,'' the association stated.

Within hours after Wednesday's order was issued, Thomas Manger, president of the chiefs' association, and Tom Cochran, executive director of the mayors' conference, called for a meeting with the Justice Department for guidance on how to proceed. Trump's attorney general nominee, Alabama Sen. Jeff Sessions, known for his hard-line approach to immigration policy, is awaiting a Senate confirmation vote

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, said that police operating in so-called sanctuary cities have been shadowed by the "false perception'' that they have been held back from pursuing serious criminals.

"That is just not correct,'' said Wexler, who also chaired a Department of Homeland Security panel that examined security in heavily immigrant communities. "When it came to dealing with serious criminals, there was no ambiguity on what needed to be done.''

At the same time, Wexler said, police should not be substitutes for everyday immigration agents, enforcing status disputes and other minor civil violations.

"Local police need to have the community's confidence and know they can be free to report problems without consequences,'' he said. "If people are afraid to come to the police, that domestic violence incident today will be a homicide tomorrow and that's in no one's interest.''

Trump's directive, meanwhile, won the endorsement of the nation's largest police union and a national coalition of sheriffs.

"Previous solutions called for an unequivocal end to all federal grants for recalcitrant jurisdictions and there was a real concern about this approach,'' Fraternal Order of Police President Chuck Canterbury said. The union said the provision in Trump's order that preserved the eligibility of police in sanctuary cities for federal grants, with the attorney general's approval, sealed its support.

"The FOP opposed several bills in the previous Congress which would have blocked state and local law enforcement grants to sanctuary cities because in most cases these sanctuary jurisdictions were established by policymakers at the local level,'' Canterbury said. "The FOP argued that it was unfair to penalize the law enforcement agencies serving these jurisdictions for the political decisions of elected officials which prohibited or impeded cooperation with federal agencies.''

Jonathan Thompson, executive director of the National Sheriffs' Association, said the president's pledge add thousands to the ranks of the Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement would ease the dependence on local law enforcement.

"It's key to remember that for too long sheriffs were the meat in the immigration enforcement sandwich,'' Thompson said. "No more. (Trump) is hiring 10,000 enforcement officers, which we have been calling for.''

Trump's Immigration Crackdown Will Be Golden For Private Prisons

By Laurie Roberts

Arizona Republic, January 26, 2017

Donald Trump's crackdown on illegal immigration is stupendous news for the private prison industry.

Already, 2017 looked to be a profitable year with his election. Now comes Trump's plan to lock up more immigrants who are here illegally.

Well, he's going to have to put them someplace until the backlogged immigration courts can hold deportation hearings. Where better than a prison prison, where a major of those currently detained while awaiting deportation reside?

Before Trump, they lost their federal contracts

"The reality is, DHS is not going to have the ability to detain all these folks," David Inserra, an analyst at the Heritage Foundation, told Daily Beast reporter Betsy Woodruff. "You have to rely on the private contractors."

Who, no doubt, are counting their billion-dollar blessings today. This after last year's announcement that they would lose their federal contracts.

In August, the U.S. Justice Department announced it would stop using private prisons, declaring them less safe than government-run prisons and no cheaper to operate.

"They simply do not provide the same level of correctional services, programs, and resources; they do not save substantially on costs; and as noted in a recent report by the Department's Office of Inspector General, they do not maintain the same level of safety and security," then-Deputy Attorney General Sally Yates said, in announcing that the feds are "reducing – and ultimately ending – our use of privately operated prisons."

But that was B.T. (Before Trump).

After Trump, everything's golden for GEO Group

Now, Seeking Alpha, a website offering investment advice, is predicting that the stock of the nation's second-largest private prison operator, The GEO Group, could jump 25 percent this year.

"While multiple sectors have outperformed the broader market in the Trump Rally, one of the biggest winners has been The GEO Group, (NYSE:GEO), a private-prison focused REIT that is up almost 70% since November 8," the website said. "The basic rationale is that a Trump administration will emphasize private industry and law-and-order, both which will serve as significant macro tailwinds for the private prison industry over the next 4 years."

Just coincidentally, I'm sure, Politico has reported that GEO Group recently hired two former aides of Alabama Sen. Jeff Sessions, who will head Trump's Justice Department.

GEO already does well in Arizona. Last year, Gov. Doug Ducey gave a $2.5 million state subsidy to the Florida-based company, which operates the private prison near Kingman and coincidentally, I'm sure, is a campaign contributor.

Private prisons have long been a sacred cow at the state Capitol. Well-connected lobbyists spread around campaign cash to ensure that their interests are paramount and their prisons are full – or if not, they're paid as if they are full anyway.

Now, with Trump's election, they're back on solid (gold) ground with the feds.

Why Trump's Executive Order On Sanctuary Cities Is Unconstitutional

By Ilya Somin

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

Yesterday, President Donald Trump signed an executive order denying federal funding to sanctuary cities – jurisdictions that choose not to cooperate with federal efforts to deport undocumented immigrants. The order has serious constitutional problems. Unless interpreted very narrowly, it is both unconstitutional and a very dangerous precedent. Trump and future presidents could use it to seriously undermine constitutional federalism by forcing dissenting cities and states to obey presidential dictates, even without authorization from Congress. The circumvention of Congress makes the order a threat to separation of powers, as well.

The order indicates that sanctuary cities "that fail to comply with applicable Federal law do not receive Federal funds, except as mandated by law." More specifically, it mandates that "the Attorney General and the [Homeland Security] Secretary, in their discretion and to the extent consistent with law, shall ensure that jurisdictions that willfully refuse to comply with 8 U.S.C. 1373 (sanctuary jurisdictions) are not eligible to receive Federal grants, except as deemed necessary for law enforcement purposes by the Attorney General or the Secretary."

Section 1373 mandates that "a Federal, State, or local government entity or official may not prohibit, or in any way restrict, any government entity or official from sending to, or receiving from, the Immigration and Naturalization Service information regarding the citizenship or immigration status, lawful or unlawful, of any individual."

There are two serious constitutional problems with conditioning federal grants to sanctuary cities on compliance with Section 1373. First, longstanding Supreme Court precedent mandates that the federal government may not impose conditions on grants to states and localities unless the conditions are "unambiguously" stated in the text of the law "so that the States can knowingly decide whether or not to accept those funds." Few if any federal grants to sanctuary cities are explicitly conditioned on compliance with Section 1373. Any such condition must be passed by Congress, and may only apply to new grants, not ones that have already been appropriated. The executive cannot simply make up new conditions on its own and impose them on state and local governments. Doing so undermiens both separation of powers and federalism.

Even aside from Trump's dubious effort to tie it to federal grants, Section 1373 is itself unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has repeatedly ruled that the federal government may not "commandeer" state and local officials by compelling them to enforce federal law. Such policies violate the Tenth Amendment.

Section 1373 attempts to circumvent this prohibition by forbidding higher-level state and local officials from mandating that lower-level ones refuse to help in enforcing federal policy. But the same principle that forbid direct commandeering also count against Section 1373. As the late conservative Justice Antonin Scalia explained in Printz v. United States, the purpose of the anti-commandeering doctrine is the "[p]reservation of the States as independent and autonomous political entities." That independence and autonomy is massively undermined if the federal government can take away the states' power to decide what state and local officials may do while on the job. As Scalia put it in the same opinion, federal law violates the Tenth Amendment if it "requires [state employees] to provide information that belongs to the State and is available to them only in their official capacity." The same is true if, as in the case of Section 1373, the federal government tries to prevent states from controlling their employees' use of information that "is available to them only in their official capacity."

Some defenders of Trump's policy claim that the anti-commandeering rule does not apply to federal laws that mandate disclosure of information. I addressed that argument here. Quite simply, there is no information-disclosure exception to the Tenth Amendment, and it would be very dangerous for the courts to create one.

The Trump administration might try to push a more expansive interpretation of Section 1373 that goes beyond information-sharing and extends to actual detention of undocumented immigrants targeted for deportation. That would only make the law more clearly unconstitutional than if it were limited to information. Pushing state officials to detain people is an even greater interference with state "independence and autonomy" than pressuring them to disclose information.

Unlike the question raised by Trump's attempt to impose grant conditions not authorized by Congress, the ant-commandeering issue raised by Section 1373 has not yet been directly addressed by the Supreme Court (though the law was upheld in a badly flawed lower court decision back in 1999). We cannot be certain what will happen when and if the justices take up this issue. But the principles underlying the Court's anti-commandeering cases should lead it to strike down this law.

The constitutional issues raised by Trump's executive order are not mere technicalities. If the president can make up new conditions on federal grants to the states and impose them without specific, advance congressional authorization, he would have a powerful tool for bullying states and localities into submission on a wide range of issues. Such an executive power-grab also undermines separation of powers. Congress, not the president, has the constitutional authority to attach conditions to federal grants to state governments.

Even if the power-grab is limited to withholding funds when states or localities violate other federal laws and regulations, it is still a grave menace. There are literally thousands of federal laws and regulations on the books. No jurisdiction can fully comply with all of them. If the president can withhold funds from any state or locality that violates any federal law, without needing specific authorization from Congress, he would have sweeping authority over state officials.

Trump's order is exactly the kind of high-handed federal coercion of states and undermining of separation of powers that outraged conservatives under Obama. In fact, Obama did not go as far as Trump seems to do here. Obama never claimed sweeping authority to impose new conditions on federal grants beyond those specifically imposed by Congress. Even those who sympathize Trump's objectives in this case should pause to consider whether they want presidents to have this kind of power going forward. Trump's use of it today could easily serve as a model for a liberal Democratic president tomorrow.

I have my reservations about some aspects of the Supreme Court's conditional spending precedents. The doctrine is far from ideal. But it is far preferable to letting the president make up conditions and impose them without congressional authorization.

The administration could potentially avoid these constitutional problems if they interpret the order very narrowly. The text states that federal funds will only be withheld from sanctuary cities "to the extent consistent with law." taken literally, that might bar any withholding of funds not explicitly conditioned on compliance with Section 1373. After all, the Constitution is the law, and the Constitution does not allow the president to impose grant conditions not specifically authorized by Congress. But such a narrow interpretation would make the order largely superfluous. After all, the federal government is already required to withhold funds from jurisdictions that disobey conditions specifically imposed by Congress. Still, it is better that the order be redundant than that it mount an assault on federalism and separation of powers.

If Trump does not withdraw this order or adopt a narrow interpretation of it, sanctuary cities should fight him in court. And all who care about constitutional federalism and separation of powers should support them.

What Chance Do Sanctuary Cities Have Against Trump's Executive Order?

By Amanda Hoover

Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2017

January 26, 2017 —As President Trump signed an executive order that attempts to coerce sanctuary cities into shifting their immigrant-friendly stances, leaders across the nation spoke out against the action, calling it unconstitutional and vowing to protect their diverse communities.

Mr. Trump signed the order Wednesday, along with another that called for the construction of his promised border wall between the United States and Mexico. The sanctuary city order calls for cuts in federal funding for cities that fail to report undocumented immigrants accused of nonviolent crimes to federal authorities seeking to deport them.

The pair of actions could drastically shift US immigration policy, and have led to outcry from elected officials who have worked to defend the 11 million people living illegally in the United States. Despite Trump's strong rhetoric on the campaign trail and immediate actions taken during his first week in office, leaders around the nation say they are prepared to protect the immigrants residing within the limits of some 200 sanctuary cities.

And legal experts have said the order, which threatens to withhold undisclosed amounts of federal funds, may embody an overstep of presidential authority and violate the Constitution.

"There is a huge question to the legality of Trump's threats. I don't think Trump unilaterally has the ability to strip federal funding," Paromita Shah, associate director at the National Immigration Project of the National Lawyers Guild, tells The Christian Science Monitor, noting that the president could intend to use the so-far loosely defined order to put pressure on localities that oppose the key tenets of his campaign.

"It's not clear, as always, if Trump is posturing by deliberately issuing vague commands for cities to do what he wants," she adds.

While the term "sanctuary city" has come into wide use, it doesn't have a legal definition. Generally, the communities classify themselves as such by refusing to hold undocumented immigrants who commit nonviolent crimes until federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents can take them into custody.

In cities and towns across the country, the scenarios arise when police arrest someone and charge him or her, taking fingerprints and sending the prints to the FBI and ICE. If federal agents decide to deport the person, officers typically continue to hold him or her for an additional 48 hours and wait for immigration officials to take the defendant into custody, even if the accused has paid bail on a nonviolent charge.

But in sanctuary cities, officers cannot hold defendants after judges order their release on bail. The policy stems from an argument that detaining people for civil immigration violations after they're to be released is a violation of the Constitution. Some sanctuary cities bar their law enforcement officials from questioning residents in an attempt to determine their immigration status.

Advocates of the programs argue that they make cities safer by giving undocumented immigrants amnesty as they come forward to report crimes, allowing bridges to be built between minority communities and law enforcement. Others say that shielding immigrants from deportation allows them to apply for business licenses and legally operate small economic ventures that boost the economy. But opponents say the measures keep dangerous criminals in the United States, putting citizens at risk and undermining federal immigration laws.

Trump's actions are short on specifics, but he again reiterated the idea that the executive order is intended to tackle issues with violent and dangerous undocumented criminals. White House Press Secretary Sean Spicer said the order would tackle cities classified as sanctuaries under the Department of Homeland Security regulations and render them ineligible for federal grants.

"They shouldn't be very worried," Trump said of the immigrants, such as those who classify as "dreamers" protected by former President Barack Obama, in an ABC News interview broadcast on Wednesday night. "Where you have great people that are here that have done a good job, they should be far less worried. We'll be coming out with policy on that over the next period of four weeks."

But leaders around the country took the executive order as a call to action, and they may have solid legal backing to maintain their statuses. Cities use federal funding for vital community functions, covering initiatives such as drug and HIV testing, job training, and assisting the elderly community. In December, Mother Jones reported that a slew of cities already indicating their will to resist anti-immigration action could stand to lose as much as 25 percent of their city or police department budgets.

Still, the threat of those losses hasn't caused leaders to reconsider their stances. Democratic Boston Mayor Marty Walsh called the executive action "the most destructive and un-American threat on America," and offered up Boston City Hall as a safe haven for the city's undocumented residents.

"If people want to live here, they'll live here," he said at a press conference Wednesday. "They can use my office. They can use any office in this building."

Others have said they would rely on legal action to fight the directive, which could serve to contradict its anti-terror and crime-fighting goals.

"We think it's very susceptible to legal challenge," New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) told CNN. "If they make an attempt to pull that money, it will be from NYPD, from security funding to fight terrorism. If an attempt is made to do that, we will go to court immediately for an injunction to stop it."

In California, mayors of San Francisco, San Jose, Oakland, and the state legislature have joined together to form a united front against the policy changes.

Trump's directives could clash with the 10th Amendment, which gives states the rights to create their own legislation in conjunction with federal laws and regulations. It also must stand up to the 1987 Supreme Court ruling South Dakota v. Dole, in which the court found that funding can be withheld only for the specific initiative in question. Experts speculate that Congress, which would have more authority than the president to block funding, will likely be unable to deny grants to a range of programs across cities.

Sanctuary city policies "have been carefully crafted with federal laws in mind," Grisel Ruiz, a staff attorney with the Immigrant Legal Resource Center, tells the Monitor. "They can definitely stand a legal challenge in court."

While aggressive immigration policies have long created a chasm between the ICE and local law enforcement and governments, Trump's use of an executive order and threats to curtail funding represents a bolder push on part of the federal government, Ms. Ruiz adds.

"In terms of someone being this aggressive and going this far out, Trump is really setting a new standard for how aggressive he's being in trying to coerce cities," she says.

As the specifics of the laws – and their legal viability – continue to be debated, sweeping action on the part of local leaders would likely be premature. Some cities, such as Los Angeles, have set up funds to provide legal services for immigrants, and others have evaluated their local police departments and developed new ways to increase their presence in historically isolated, minority communities. Both of those tactics can serve to protect undocumented immigrants.

For now, voicing their opposition to the action and reaffirming their commitment to protecting undocumented immigrants in their cities as valuable community members is a strong step for elected officials to take, Ms. Shah says.

"They wouldn't have passed these policies if they weren't on firm [legal] footing," she says. "I don't see anything here that they're required to change anything that they're doing. Everything they've been doing has been within the confines of the law."

Despite Calls To Defund Sanctuary Cities, A Steady Drumbeat Of Judicial Decisions Defends Them

By Christopher Lasch

The Hill, January 26, 2017

President Trump's recent executive order, "Enhancing Public Safety in the Interior of the United States," promises an era of unprecedented cruelty and, like President Trump's other plans on immigration, is dissociated from factual and legal reality.

President Trump was elected in part because of his anti-immigrant policies. Making "sanctuary" a dirty word was part and parcel of that platform, as was the strategy he pursues today—invoking "public safety" as the justification for increased interior enforcement and attacks on sanctuary jurisdictions. But studies have conclusively rejected the factual grounding for his anti-sanctuary stance—the identification of immigrants with criminality—as a myth.

On the legal side, a line of unbroken judicial decisions from 2014 straight through to 2017 affirms the soundness of sanctuary policies distancing local law enforcement from federal immigration enforcement.

Although there were just a few dozen sanctuary cities as recently as 2010, by some estimates there are now over 500 "sanctuary" jurisdictions scattered across the United States. This includes two states (California and Connecticut) that have statutory limits on cooperation with federal immigration enforcement.

What caused this tidal wave of sanctuary policies? While different jurisdictions have pursued different local policies (including the creation of diverse, inclusive communities; the elimination of racial and ethnic discrimination; and flat-out resistance to federal immigration policies that have been described as inhumane), there is no doubt that the most prevalent reason for the wave of sanctuary policies adopted since 2014 has been a legal one.

The Fourth Amendment prohibits warrantless arrests except those based on probable cause. And a series of judicial decisions (from federal courts in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Oregon) from early 2014 cast doubt on the practice of using federally issued immigration "detainers" to continue imprisoning in local jails noncitizens who would otherwise be entitled to release.

These decisions acquired sufficient force that the Obama administration was forced to scrap the centerpiece of its interior immigration enforcement program. Far from being "popular and successful," Secure Communities was wildly unpopular and legally doomed. On Nov. 20, 2014, pointing to "the increasing number of federal court decisions that hold that detainer-based detention by state and local law enforcement agencies violates the Fourth Amendment," then Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson declared an end to the program.

Many of the "sanctuary" policies that President Trump and the Republicans have in their sights for funding cuts are nothing more than policies limiting the use of detainers. Put more simply, they are policies for obeying the Fourth Amendment. Just in this month, a state court in New York, and federal courts in Minnesota, Texas, and Rhode Island (where the court cautioned, "that a United States citizen was held in prison on an erroneous immigration detainer without probable cause for even one night should concern all Americans") have added to the drumbeat of decisions establishing this basic legal fact.

A fifth decision, from a federal court in California, dealt several important blows to Trump's plans. In July 2015, the shooting death of Kathryn Steinle by an undocumented man who had been deported five times previously reignited the sanctuary city debate. The case became the cornerstone of candidate Trump's immigration policy, and particularly his attack on sanctuary cities—he repeatedly invoked the case, using racially coded language, to exaggerate the threat presented by immigrants. He mentioned Ms. Steinle when he accepted the Republican nomination, and when he outlined his immigration platform.

On Jan. 6, though, a federal court dismissed a lawsuit brought against San Francisco city officials, which had essentially alleged that San Francisco's sanctuary policy caused Ms. Steinle's death. The court concluded there was no legal theory by which city officials could be held liable. Additionally, the decision provides legal support for one common type of sanctuary policy—the refusal to provide federal immigration officials with information concerning a state or local prisoner's upcoming release date. Considering a law which has been regularly invoked to claim that sanctuary policies "flout federal law," the court held that "no plausible reading of [the law] encompasses the release date of an undocumented inmate."

The message of these decisions is clear. If the self-proclaimed "law-and-order candidate" is going to follow the law as president, he would do well to abandon his attack on sanctuary cities.

In Fact, Sanctuary Cities Have Less Poverty And Crime

Atlantic's CityLab, January 26, 2017

New research contradicts President Trump's claim that these areas do "immeasurable harm" to their residents.

On Wednesday, President Donald Trump announced two executive orders to jumpstart his immigration agenda. In one of them, he asked "sanctuary cities"—jurisdictions that legally limit their local police from collaborating with federal immigration authorities—to stop doing so, or else, lose federal funds. Per the order:

Sanctuary jurisdictions across the United States willfully violate Federal law in an attempt to shield aliens from removal from the United States. These jurisdictions have caused immeasurable harm to the American people and to the very fabric of our Republic.

The harm the order refers to is a decline in public safety. But that decline doesn't appear to exist. To the contrary: Sanctuary cities show lower crime and higher economic well-being, a new analysis published by the Center for American Progress and the National Immigration Law Center shows.

In the report, Tom K. Wong, an associate professor of political science at the University of California, San Diego, analyzed a sample of 2,492 counties from an Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) dataset. In this sample, 602 were identified by ICE as "sanctuary" counties, where local law enforcement didn't accept "detainers"—requests from ICE to hold suspected undocumented individuals in custody for extra time. Wong compared the crime rates and economic conditions in these counties with the ones that did comply with ICE, controlling for population and demographic characteristics.

He found 35.5 fewer violent and property crimes per 10,000 people in sanctuary counties versus non-sanctuary ones—"a result that is highly statistically significant." Counties in large metros reported an even more dramatically difference, with 65.4 fewer crimes per 10,000 people.

Sanctuary counties also registered better economic conditions. On average, they had higher median incomes (by about $4,353), lower poverty (by 2.3 percent), and slightly lower unemployment rates (1.1 percent). These positive effects were exaggerated in the small counties, where the contributions of each individual immigrant were likely to have a larger impact.

Wong concludes:

The data support arguments made by law enforcement executives that communities are safer when law enforcement agencies do not become entangled in federal immigration enforcement efforts. The data also make clear that, when counties protect all of their residents, they see significant economic gains. By keeping out of federal immigration enforcement, sanctuary counties are keeping families together—and when households remain intact and individuals can continue contributing, this strengthens local economies.

Wong's analysis is not the first to contradict this administration's narrative on sanctuary cities. A previous study examined crime rates over time in these areas. Some, like San Francisco, experienced a rise in crime after the fact; others, like Baltimore, saw the opposite effect. On average, the researchers observed no "statistically significant effect" on crime after these cities enacted sanctuary-type policies.

There are mayors on both sides of the political aisle who argue that conflating policing with immigration enforcement leads to a breakdown in the community trust—a claim that research has backed up. They argue that "sanctuary cities" do cooperate with authorities, just in a way that doesn't jeopardize the relationship local police have with immigrant populations. Wong's findings support their case: Cities where immigrant communities trust authorities to report crime are safer and more productive.

Sheriff Who Texas Governor Wants Out Slams Immigrant 'fear'

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

AUSTIN, Texas (AP) – A Texas sheriff under fire from Republican Gov. Greg Abbott over so-called "sanctuary cities" policies says streets are safer when people can report crimes "without fear of deportation."

Travis County Sheriff Sally Hernandez on Thursday fired back for the first time since the governor vowed this week to cut off some state funding and change laws to remove her from office.

The conflict started after Hernandez, an elected Democrat, said she would no longer comply with all federal immigration detainers in Austin jails.

She pointedly made the announcement hours after President Donald Trump was sworn into office. Trump this week moved to cut off money to local governments that don't fully cooperate with federal immigration officials.

Hernandez says she won't let "fear and misinformation" dictate her job.

Gov. Greg Abbott Hunting For More Funds To Cut From Travis County In Sanctuary City Battle

By Brandi Grissom

Dallas Morning News, January 26, 2017

AUSTIN – Gov. Greg Abbott is on the hunt for more funding to cut from Travis County after the sheriff there refused to reverse a policy the governor says makes the Austin area a sanctuary for undocumented immigrants.

Steven Albright, Abbott's budget director, on Thursday sent a letter to the heads of all state agencies asking them to identify all funds, including federal dollars, that had been allotted to Travis County in the 2016 fiscal year.

The letter comes amid an ongoing skirmish between Abbott and Travis County Sheriff Sally Hernandez. Last Friday, Hernandez announced that she would no longer turn certain undocumented immigrants in her jail over to federal immigration officials. The decision incensed Abbott, who has made banning sanctuary cities a priority for the current legislative session.

Abbott spokesman John Wittman declined to comment on the letter Thursday evening.

Abbott sent Hernandez a letter on Monday threatening to take away $1.8 million in law enforcement grants from her department if the sheriff did not reverse her "reckless" policy by Feb. 1. On Wednesday, he said during a FOX News interview that Hernandez ought to be ousted from her elected office, and he called on lawmakers to pass legislation that would punish local officials who promote sanctuary policies.

Abbott and others who decry so-called sanctuary policies say they worry the practice could leave criminals who are in the country illegally free to roam the streets and victimize others.

While GOP state senators sent Hernandez a letter also lambasting her decision, Democrats from Austin came to her defense with a blistering letter to Abbott, calling his threats an overreach.

"Threatening Sheriff Hernandez with removal from office and withholding much-needed funding from the county is a vast overreach of executive authority," Reps. Eddie Rodriguez, Donna Howard, Celia Israel and Gina Hinojosa wrote.

On Thursday, Hernandez issued a public statement saying she would not back away from her policy on immigrants in the local jail. She said her directive does not violate any state or federal laws and makes the community safer.

"I respect the job of our state leaders, but I will not allow fear and misinformation to be my guiding principles as a leader sworn to protect this community," she said.

The letter from Abbott's budget director seeks not only to identify state funds but also seeks out federal funds that go to the county. It's a signal that more cuts could come not only from Abbott's pen but from the executive order that President Trump signed Wednesday that would cut money to sanctuary cities.

Trump Could Revive Missouri Proposal On Deported Immigrants

By Summer Ballentine

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) – As President Donald Trump rolls out plans to build a wall on the Mexican border and considers blocking refugees, Missouri lawmakers are trying again to pass a bill aimed at cracking down on deported immigrants who come back and commit crimes.

Under the proposal pitched Thursday by Republican Sen. Mike Cunningham, immigrants who are deported but come back and commit any assault or felony offense would face up to 10 years in prison for "illegal re-entry." The bill directs those inmates to be transferred to federal immigration authorities as soon as possible.

The proposal died in the House after passing the Senate when it was introduced last year, but Trump's election could add momentum to such efforts in Missouri and elsewhere.

"It makes it easier for things like this to pass because already the hatred has been brought to the surface," said Missouri Immigrant and Refugee Advocates Executive Director Aimee Abizera, who fled the genocide in her home country of Rwanda. "People feel like they have a right to do it."

Missouri appears to be the first and only state to consider such a proposal, said Nick Bullock, spokesman for the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Earlier this week, a bill moved forward in Florida's Senate that seeks to increase sentences for crimes committed by immigrants living in the country illegally. It proposes that immigrants who commit felonies and misdemeanors face charges that are a degree higher so the sentences are harsher.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

An immigrant rights group said that it wasn't a coincidence the bill was approved by the committee the same week the Trump administration announced new actions on immigration.

In blue states, Trump's policies have led to pushback. A New York legislator wants to block the state from signing contracts or investing in companies hired to build a border wall, and state and local officials in California have blasted a Trump policy targeting immigrant-protecting sanctuary cities.

Cunningham proposed the Missouri bill last year amid frustration among some lawmakers over former Democratic President Barack Obama's handling of immigration issues. In arguing for the bill, Cunningham has cited Pablo Antonio Serrano-Vitorino, a Mexican national charged last year with the high profile fatal shootings of five men in Missouri and Kansas. Cunningham called Serrano-Vitorino the "scum of the Earth."

"We've had some egregious crimes committed by these people," Republican Sen. Brian Munzlinger said Thursday. "Hopefully the feds will step up so we won't ever have to use this law. But until they do, it gives us another alternative."

Efforts on the state level to crack down on immigrants living in the country illegally have previously run into court challenges.

The U.S. Supreme Court in 2012 struck down key provisions of Arizona's crackdown on immigrants but did not throw out the state provision requiring police to check the immigration status of someone they suspect is in the United States without documentation. The court prohibited police officers from arresting people on minor immigration charges.

Opponents to the Missouri bill on Thursday also raised constitutional questions about the role of the state in immigration enforcement. ACLU of Missouri lobbyist Sara Baker told a panel of senators during the hearing that if the bill is challenged, it "almost surely" would be struck down.

Abizera and others also raised concerns that the measure could be used more broadly against immigrants who don't commit violent crimes.

"It's already considered to be criminal when you enter here without status," Abizera said. "And so when (Cunningham) says we're going after criminals, practically we're going after immigrants."

In These Six American Towns, Laws Targeting 'the Illegals' Didn't Go As Planned

By Chico Harlan

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

HAZLETON, Pa. — Starting a decade ago, a group of small U.S. cities began passing laws to block undocumented immigrants from living within their borders.

They were a collection of mostly white exurbs and faded manufacturing towns whose populations suddenly were transforming. More Latinos were arriving in search of jobs, and the towns' leaders complained of burdened schools and higher crime.

Here in this northeastern Pennsylvania city, then-Mayor Lou Barletta said he would do what he could to restore "law and order" and take back his city. It was time, Barletta said, for a "war on the illegals."

And while that sentiment is shared among some advisers to President Trump, the experiences of these towns show how measures targeting undocumented immigrants can leave lasting and bitter racial divisions while doing little to address the underlying forces that often determine where newcomers settle.

The laws in most cases aimed to make it illegal for landlords to rent to undocumented immigrants and threatened fines for employers who hired them. But among the six most high-profile towns that tried to pass such laws, all have been foiled by court rulings, settlements or challenges with enforcement. Several have been ordered to pay the legal fees for the civil rights groups that brought suits. And in five of the six towns, the Latino population — legal or illegal — has continued to grow, attracted by a continued rise in low-paying jobs.

"It wound up costing our city $9 million in attorney's fees," said Bob Phelps, the mayor of Farmers Branch, Tex., a Dallas suburb that saw its ordinance defeated in court after a seven-year legal battle. "And we accomplished zero."

The local efforts were championed by two men who are now Trump advisers and reportedly were considered for Cabinet positions. Kansas Secretary of State Kris Kobach, who counseled most of the cities in their legal challenges, consulted with Trump during his campaign about issues including a border wall with Mexico. Barletta is now a U.S. House member and was part of Trump's transition team.

Trump on Wednesday rolled out the first phase of what is expected to be sweeping immigration policy changes, signing orders for the construction of a border wall and the targeting of "sanctuary cities" that resist the deportation of undocumented immigrants. His administration is also considering tighter restrictions on refugees from several Muslim-majority countries. Trump has more latitude to carry out immigration policy changes than states or cities do, but his policies could face legal challenges — or bring about unintended economic consequences.

"These ideas are more easy to sell as political talking points than as real policy options," said Muzaffar Chishti, the director of the Migration Policy Institute at the New York

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

University School of Law. “Just because you say you want to do something doesn’t mean you’ll be able to.”

Difficulties with enforcement

The towns that took action — Hazleton; Farmers Branch; Valley Park, Mo.; Riverside, N.J.; Escondido, Calif.; and Fremont, Neb. — did so largely out of frustration, fed up with swift demographic changes and what they saw as the rising costs of caring for undocumented residents. The newcomers were drawn by cheaper housing costs and new industries that attracted low-wage labor.

“The presence of illegal aliens places a fiscal burden on the city,” Fremont’s ordinance read.

At the same time, the federal government’s inability to seal the border was helping to drive an argument that towns and states had the legal right to do a job that Washington could not manage. Kobach, a longtime activist who worked at the time for the legal arm of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, sought to use those towns as a testing ground for his aggressive stance. Most of the laws were passed in a flurry between 2006 and 2007.

Although immigration enforcement had long been the purview of the federal government, finding those who had crossed the border illegally or overstayed visas was not doable without the help of local law enforcement, said Rosemary Jenks, the director of government relations at NumbersUSA, which favors a reduction in immigration.

“You should help states and localities do what they want to do voluntarily in order to help the enforcement of immigration law,” Jenks said.

But localities have not gotten the chance. In Hazleton and Farmers Branch, federal judges ruled the ordinances discriminatory and unconstitutional. In Escondido, the town quickly backed away after a challenge by the American Civil Liberties Union. In Valley Park, the town’s mayor decided to no longer enforce what his predecessor had put in place. In Riverside, as legal bills piled up, the city council rescinded the ordinance, fearing damage to businesses. Dozens of other towns considering “Illegal Immigration Relief Act” laws backed off.

The municipality that has come the closest to successfully implementing such a law is Fremont, a meatpacking town west of Omaha where a six-year court fight, financed through a tax increase, won the city the right to ban undocumented immigrants from rental housing. But just as the city’s officials put the law in place in 2014, they realized it would not be effective: Fremont’s rental applications, with their wording approved by the courts, did not require the information, such as a Social Security number, that could help determine whether a person was in the United States legally.

Courts also have weakened several states’ illegal-immigrant laws, most notably in Arizona. Michael Hethmon, who is senior counsel for the Immigration Reform Law Institute and helped Kobach handle the Hazleton case, said that the local efforts have faced more setbacks than victories but that the towns’ money has been “well spent” in taking a stance. The towns had no data on the number of undocumented residents before or after the ordinances, making it difficult to measure how well the laws worked in driving away that part of the population.

“If you compare our advocacy struggle to other issues — civil rights issues or LGBT — you have to remember that those folks lost a lot more [at the beginning] before they ultimately prevailed,” Hethmon said.

The battles over the local ordinances, residents of those towns say, helped create fault lines that remain visible. Escondido in 2014 rejected a permit for a shelter that would have housed unaccompanied minors who had come across the southwest U.S. border; a new ACLU lawsuit alleges that the rejection was driven by anti-immigrant sentiment. In Fremont, the town has been split by a proposed new Costco poultry processing plant — one that would add hundreds of jobs but probably would accelerate the arrival of immigrants.

“The makeup of our town has really changed, and again with this chicken plant, there’s going to be a majority of low-income jobs that will not bring us taxpayers and homeowners,” said Dawn Wiegert, 55, who has lived in Fremont for 25 years. “People that will be a burden on all of our other resources — I don’t know how else to say it without sounding racist.”

In Hazleton, the first place to propose an illegal-immigrant law, some of the tensions have worsened with the proliferation of social media, said Joleen Reis, 24, a Hazleton day-care worker who is one of the few who straddle the white and Latino communities. Her father came to Pennsylvania from Peru as a migrant worker and met her mother, who is white.

Reis pulled up a local-news page on Facebook. The latest item mentioned a police report — two men in dark clothing stealing from vehicles.

“So are you ready for America without illegals?” one commenter said. “Because I am!”

“Filthy animals!” another said. “Send them back somewhere now!”

Reis sighed.

“I try not to read this stuff, typically,” Reis said. “But they assume everyone is illegal. And it’s always ‘us’ versus ‘them.’ “

Blamed for town’s woes

Tucked under the crisscross of highways near the Pocono Mountains, Hazleton had endured the slow-motion decay common in blue-collar manufacturing and mining towns, only this time there was a twist: A newer set of state tax breaks helped lure a blitz of distribution centers, as well as a Cargill slaughterhouse, to the outskirts of town. The Latino population, at 4 percent in 2000, had soared to 38 percent by 2006, with many Dominicans moving from the Bronx and Brooklyn in search of jobs and cheaper housing. Barletta said he was concerned about higher crime rates, and when a 29-year-old was killed, allegedly by undocumented immigrants, he decided to act.

He searched on his computer about get-tough laws on immigration, finding an ordinance, debated but never passed, written by the city council in San Bernardino, Calif. Barletta copied the text almost verbatim. Hazleton's ordinance would make it illegal for businesses to hire undocumented immigrants and called for fines for landlords who rented to them.

Several months later, Hazleton had a new law and CNN trucks outside its city hall.

Barletta emphasized that he opposed only those in the United States illegally and was driven to act by several obvious problems: The population was booming, but the tax base wasn't — a sign, he said, of undocumented immigrants not contributing to the system. Schools were spending more money to educate Spanish-speaking students. Hazleton's woefully understaffed police force — short by about 30 officers — was struggling to deal with an uptick in violent crime.

"I saw how it affected the lives of people, our emergency rooms, our schools," Barletta said in an interview. "A mayor had to take the stand. Listen, it wasn't fun — trust me. When my dog barked in the middle of the night, I had a shotgun under my bed."

The law easily won the city council's approval, but its enforcement was held up by an injunction and a lawsuit brought by civil rights groups, including the ACLU. In court, some of Barletta's arguments for the law ran into trouble: He said he didn't know how many undocumented immigrants lived in Hazleton or how many had committed crimes. The town hadn't studied it.

A federal judge eventually ruled that the law was illegal because it usurped the federal government's power and would affect not just undocumented immigrants but "those who look or act as if they are foreign." Other courts upheld that ruling over eight years. Kobach, paid $250,000 by Hazleton, did not respond to multiple requests seeking comment.

In 2015, a federal judge ordered Hazleton to pay $1.4 million to the lawyers who had fought the town.

The city, with a budget of $9 million, took out a bank loan and cut a check to the ACLU, said Joseph Yannuzzi, the mayor who succeeded Barletta.

"With that money," Yannuzzi said, "we could have hired 12 police officers."

'No choice about the changes'

Latinos now constitute 50 percent of Hazleton's population. They've opened up carnicerias and beauty salons and boutiques along once-decrepit Wyoming Street. They tend to be younger and much likelier to work than Hazleton's white residents, according to census data, and now make up much of the labor force at the airport-size distribution centers of American Eagle and Amazon.com (whose chief executive, Jeffrey P. Bezos, owns The Washington Post). Hazleton native Joe Maddon, the manager of the Chicago Cubs, several years ago opened up a community center aimed at building closer relationships between whites and Hispanics.

"To be honest, residents who were here before don't have no choice about the changes," said Eric Garcia, 37, a Dominican who moved to Hazleton from New York in 2005 and owns a photo studio.

But many longtime residents, unnerved by the influx of foreigners, have left the city limits for what they call the "valley" suburbs. With an immigration message similar to Barletta's, Trump won nearly 60 percent of the votes in Hazleton's Luzerne County.

Jamie Longazel, a Hazleton native and University of Dayton sociologist who in 2016 published a book about his home town, "Undocumented Fears," said that Barletta, with his ordinance, introduced a "villain" that people barely talked about beforehand. Longazel found in his research that only 0.7 percent of crimes in Hazleton between 2001 and 2006 had been committed by undocumented immigrants.

"I don't want to made it sound like Hazleton is only full of backwards racists," said Longazel, who conducted focus groups and interviews with longtime white residents. "I want to emphasize this point that a lot of the scapegoating we see is top-down. Politicians are speaking this language and then we tend to echo it, rather than there being malicious intent from the bottom."

House GOP Warns D.C. Mayor Not To Use Tax Money Defending Illegal Immigrants

By Aaron C. Davis

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

House Republicans with oversight of the nation's capital are taking aim at D.C. Mayor Muriel E. Bowser's plan to use taxpayer money to defend illegal immigrants from deportation.

The D.C. mayor received a letter Wednesday from Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-Idaho), chairman of the House Oversight Committee, and Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.), head of the subcommittee for District affairs, warning Bowser that her plan appears to violate federal law and that the committees are investigating.

Bowser this month joined leaders from Chicago, Los Angeles and New York in announcing that the District would set up a legal-defense fund to represent illegal immigrants targeted for deportation under policies of President Trump.

The fund, Bowser said, would "double down" on the District's status as a "sanctuary city." D.C. police are already instructed not to ask about immigration status, and city corrections officials provide only limited help in identifying nonviolent criminals to federal agents for deportation.

Bowser said the $500,000 fund would take the city beyond being just a sanctuary, providing initial funds for the District to defend its estimated 25,000 illegal immigrants. The efforts, she said, would include hiring attorneys to conduct seminars for illegal immigrants to know their rights with federal agents and to represent city residents in deportation proceedings and in applying for asylum.

The District's complicated financial relationship with the federal government, however, means D.C. may have less latitude than cities in the 50 states to carry out the plan.

Because D.C. is a federal territory, local lawmakers cannot spend any of the city's local tax revenue — which tops $7 billion annually — in ways that conflict with federal spending rules. And a decades-old federal law known as the Immigration and Nationality Act says no taxpayer money can be used to assist illegal immigrants in fighting deportation.

Chaffetz and Meadows cited the law in their letter and ordered Bowser's office to turn over all documents related to the planned fund, including any internal legal documents drafted to defend the mayor's proposal, as well as a list of outside organizations that could receive grant money from the fund.

"The District's planned use of funds … to pay for legal representation of individuals subject to removal proceedings appears to be in conflict with existing federal law," wrote Chaffetz and Meadows.

A spokeswoman for their committees declined to comment.

Bowser said the congressional investigation highlighted anew the District's need for statehood and the "special" burden D.C. residents face. "These are the types of questions we will be called to answer," she said.

The letter from Chaffetz and Meadows arrived as Trump was at the Department of Homeland Security, announcing an executive order to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border and to ramp up deportations of illegal immigrants already in the country.

Trump's order instructed his administration to identify federal funds that could be withheld from D.C. and other cities if they maintained sanctuary policies.

D.C. budget officials quickly said the order could wreak havoc on the city, potentially calling into question billions in annual funding assistance.

But as mayors across the country weighed in with defiant statements, Bowser's office remained quiet for more than three hours.

Bowser later said the city would remain a sanctuary city, but added that the letter from Chaffetz demanding that the city produce documents had complicated the city's response to Trump. Aides to the mayor said she had held a lengthy conference call with Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting representative to Congress, to plot a response.

It is not the first time that Chaffetz has tussled with Bowser.

Two years ago, the oversight chairman raised the prospect of the mayor facing jail time for violating federal drug laws if she proceeded with carrying out a ballot measure legalizing marijuana in D.C.

Bowser allowed a partial legalization, letting residents carry and consume marijuana. But she did not press a bigger showdown with Chaffetz to tax and regulate it, as Colorado and other states have where voters passed similar measures.

The District has been left with one of the nation's most tortured marijuana policies, where possession is legal, but sales and purchases remain illegal.

Chaffetz dropped the matter amid warnings by then-President Barack Obama that the White House supported the District's rights to set its own drug laws.

With a Republican in the White House, it is unclear how far House Republicans may now go in asserting control over the District.

This week, the House passed a bill that would permanently ban the District from spending its own tax money to subsidize abortions for low-income women. The White House issued a statement that it would sign the bill.

Similar efforts to roll back D.C. gun laws have also been introduced in the House.

Campuses Wary Of Offering 'Sanctuary' To Undocumented Students

By Julia Preston

New York Times, January 26, 2017

Janet Napolitano, president of the University of California, knows exactly what's at stake if President Trump shuts down an Obama administration program that has given work permits and protection from deportation to some 752,000 young undocumented immigrants. In 2012, in her previous job as secretary of Homeland Security, she signed the document — nothing more than a policy memo — that created the program.

So when alarm spread among immigrants on college campuses following Mr. Trump's election, Ms. Napolitano moved quickly to determine what the California system could do to shelter its students if he carried through on his pledges to cancel the program, Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals. The university estimates that almost 3,800 among its 190,000 students are undocumented, many but not all with DACA.

Ms. Napolitano, retaining her law enforcement instincts, does not mention the word "sanctuary" when describing what the university could offer. "Sanctuary is such a vague term, we don't use it," she said crisply.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Instead, the university has published detailed principles of support for undocumented students, including assurances that campus police would not question students solely about their immigration status or join any cooperation agreements with federal immigration authorities under the Trump administration. Through the Davis campus law school, the university is organizing legal help for students detained for deportation.

Another worrisome prospect, Ms. Napolitano said, is that students could lose the permits that allow them to work. Undocumented students, including any losing DACA, will continue to pay in-state tuition and be eligible for state financial aid and for a revolving loan program funded, in part, by the university.

"We want to do everything we can so students are safe on our campuses," Ms. Napolitano said, "so they can focus on what they are there to do, which is to study."

Students at dozens of college campuses, galvanized by Mr. Trump's depictions of immigrants as criminals or potential terrorists, have pressed administrators to provide sanctuary for those without legal papers. But universities have had differing ideas about what that would mean in practice, and most leaders have been careful to say they would not defy the law.

Some institutions have flatly rejected sanctuary plans as encouraging lawbreaking. At New Mexico State University, the president, Garrey Carruthers, said that banning federal agents from campus might imperil its federal funding.

One of the first presidents to declare a sanctuary campus explicitly was Michael S. Roth of Wesleyan, who announced in November that it "will not voluntarily assist" any efforts by federal authorities to deport students. Soon after, John Coatsworth, the provost of Columbia University, said that it would not allow immigration agents on campus without a warrant.

Some administrators point out that student information, including their immigration status, is already protected under long-existing privacy laws requiring the authorities to show a warrant or court order before any data can be released without students' consent.

In Georgia, Emory, which is a private university, considered but ultimately decided against protective measures. "Emory is not seeking to establish itself as a sanctuary campus, for which there is no legal definition," the university said in a Jan. 4 statement. Taking a tougher line, the University of Georgia said that any call for sanctuary was "unacceptable" and added, "We expect our institutions to follow the law."

In his first formal briefing, on Jan. 23, Sean Spicer, the White House press secretary, suggested that canceling DACA would not be a priority for the new administration, but he did not provide any explicit reassurance that the program would continue.

Ms. Napolitano is still contemplating the bitter possibility that Mr. Trump will sweep away her most significant immigration accomplishment. She hopes to persuade him that the program is a good use of executive power, emphasizing that DACA immigrants pose little security risk because they pass background checks to get into the program.

Her message for Mr. Trump: "Why waste resources trying to deport good students who've done everything right?"

Even Before Trump Acts On Immigration, New Yorkers Protest

By Liz Robbins

New York Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump had yet to act on plans to stem the flow of refugees and Muslims into the United States, but the nearly 1,000 New Yorkers gathered in Washington Square Park on Wednesday evening wasted no time in protesting whatever was next.

Earlier, Mr. Trump had issued executive orders to build a wall on the border between the United States and Mexico and to withhold federal money from so-called sanctuary cities, which do not cooperate with federal immigration officials in detaining undocumented immigrants who have been arrested on charges unrelated to their immigration status. The crowd made its displeasure on all fronts known: "No ban, no wall," the protesters cried. And then they engaged in a call and response with an Arabic greeting: "Peace be unto you. And unto you, peace."

The instant opposition extended to New York's City Hall and the chambers of the State Assembly in Albany.

Assemblyman Francisco P. Moya, a Democrat of Queens, proposed a bill Wednesday night that would limit the state's cooperation with the police in assisting immigration officers who did not have a judge's warrant to detain immigrants accused of a crime.

Among its many provisions, Mr. Trump's order called for state and local law enforcement agencies to "perform the functions of an immigration officer" in detaining and potentially deporting undocumented immigrants. Mr. Moya's bill, which had the backing of other Assembly members, would prohibit law enforcement agents from stopping, questioning, investigating or arresting an individual on the basis of a suspected immigration violation. "No state or local law enforcement agency, or agent thereof, shall perform the function of or be cross-designated as a federal immigration officer," the bill states.

A draft of Mr. Trump's next order, which remained unsigned on Thursday, included an indefinite ban on Syrian refugees and a temporary ban on immigrants coming from Muslim countries with known terrorist ties.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Council on American-Islamic Relations, the country's largest Muslim civil liberties organization, sponsored the protest on Wednesday.

"Muslim-Americans have been attacked over and over again," said Afaf Nasher, executive director of CAIR New York. "But we are resilient and strong, and we will come back with more protests, until we have our civil rights. Because this is what America is supposed to be."

Elected officials and immigrant advocates said Mr. Trump's actions would make it harder for law enforcement to maintain public safety.

Mohammad Razvi, the founder and director of the Council of Peoples Organization, a group that serves Muslims, Arabs and South Asians, helped to found a Muslim advisory board to the F.B.I. He works with the New York Police Department, and since the Sept. 11 attacks, he has encouraged his community to report crimes and to not fear the police.

"These orders are really putting a gray cloud over the hard work in building these relationships and encouraging the community to be part of mainstream America," Mr. Razvi said on Thursday.

"What this administration is emphasizing is dividing the country," he added. "Our fellow Americans are going to view these Muslims as the enemy, when this is not the case."

Mr. Razvi's bustling storefront office, which offers English classes all day, legal counseling and youth programs, sits next to a mosque in Midwood. He said that on Wednesday he was continuously stopped by concerned citizens wondering what would happen to them. Some, he said, worried that family members coming from certain countries would be denied visas. And he said neighborhood business owners reported fewer people shopping.

"The uncertainty is what's really causing fear," he said.

DREAMers Are The One Immigrant Group Donald Trump Seems Cautious About Going After

By Dara Lind

Vox, January 26, 2017

On the same day that President Donald Trump signed an executive order that would make many, if not most, unauthorized immigrants living in the United States priorities for deportation, he took pains to reassure one group of unauthorized immigrants: unauthorized immigrants who've been protected from deportation by the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program created by President Obama.

"We're going to take care of everybody," Trump told ABC News's David Muir on Wednesday. "Where you have great people who are here [and] who have done a good job — they shouldn't be worried."

Speaker of the House Paul Ryan has said similar things in the past, and made the point again Wednesday in an interview with Greta Van Susteren: "They don't have to worry. We're focused on physical security of the border, we're focused on those who are coming to do us harm, from terrorist states and [...] violent criminals."

Ryan's words, though, are empty promises — he and Congress don't control which unauthorized immigrants the government "focuses" on, and the executive order Trump signed on Wednesday explicitly tells border agents to prioritize people who could be charged with "any criminal offense" (which, for unauthorized immigrants, can include working or driving).

That executive order doesn't put DACA recipients at risk yet. But Trump is known to be considering an end to the program. Vox received what appears to be a draft of an executive order that would halt the issuing of new DACA grants and the renewing of existing ones, forcing current DACA recipients to lose their protections one by one over the next two years. Trump is ultimately the person who will determine if DACA recipients have reason to worry or not.

So his comments Wednesday don't mean that he is definitely keeping DACA around. Other comments from Trump himself and members of his administration, and reporting from (among others) Robert Costa of the Washington Post, have all indicated that Trump really is still figuring out what to do with DACA.

His reticence on this issue is striking. As of Wednesday, his executive orders (and one that is expected that will restrict refugees and certain immigrants) already remake whole swaths of US immigration policy. Only when it comes to DACA is he proceeding with any semblance of caution. DACA exists because DREAMers are both politically sympathetic and well-resourced

This is hardly the first time that unauthorized immigrants who came to the US as children have been singled out for sympathetic treatment. Indeed, that's the whole reason DACA exists to begin with.

The DREAM Act, the bill considered by Congress multiple times over the Bush and Obama administrations (and the origin of the term "DREAMers," still used to describe DACA recipients and those who qualify for DACA), was often positioned as a moderate alternative to comprehensive immigration reform with a broad pathway to citizenship for all unauthorized immigrants.

The messaging distinguished DREAMers from their parents. The government didn't have to reward people who chose to come here illegally, the argument went, but it ought to show some compassion for people who'd "been brought" to the US "through no fault of their own," who had grown up in the US and were "Americans in all but name."

DREAMers were considered morally pure and pragmatically desirable. Valedictorians are often trotted out

as representative DREAMers. While actual DACA recipients are likely to be in their 20s and 30s — someone in high school when the DREAM Act was first introduced, in 2001, would be 30 or older now — the stereotypical DREAMer has remained a high school or college student, blameless and bright-futured. They are the quintessential "good immigrant." Mark Abramson/the Washington Post via Getty

To the extent that this messaging isn't used anymore, it's largely because of the efforts of DREAMers themselves, who resist the idea that their parents should be implicitly villainized in order to make them appear more sympathetic themselves. But the fact that DREAMers have had so much power in shaping the message of the immigrant rights movement gets to the other reason they're so politically compelling: They are a well-resourced and well-organized interest group.

Demographically speaking, DREAMers are better positioned to advocate for their interests than other unauthorized immigrants: They're more likely to be fluent in English, they're integrated into their communities, and they're often "out" as unauthorized and in touch with activist networks. That makes them much harder to deport — something the Obama administration found out in some high-profile cases during its first term — and harder to ignore.

Obama's solution to this was DACA, which reinforced both DREAMers' sympathetic nature and their strength. DACA recipients are, generally, making more money now that they can work legally — giving them more resources to fight a deportation case. They are also more likely to be integrated into society now that they're formally protected from deportation. And as cruel as it seems to many Americans to deport people they think of as blameless children, it's arguably crueler to take official government recognition and security away from someone who hasn't done anything to provoke the revocation, and who handed all of her personal information over to the government in order to receive protection. What happens when Trump starts picking on people with constituencies in the United States?

When Vox received, and subsequently published, what appear to be six draft executive orders dealing with immigration, I was struck by the difference between the three that were widely known about at the time (the two that came down yesterday dealing with border and interior enforcement, and the widely rumored order restricting refugees and future immigrants) — and the rest.

The three apparent draft orders that Trump hasn't rushed to sign — the order sunsetting DACA, and two proposals regarding tighter enforcement of work visas and benefits — would all have natural constituencies within the US resisting them. A DACA revocation would get serious pushback from both DREAMers themselves and the politicians in both parties allied with them. The proposals to restrict benefits would affect both legal immigrants currently in the US (who would put themselves at risk of losing their legal status by using benefits like Medicaid) and the US citizen children of unauthorized immigrants (who would no longer qualify their parents for the child tax credit). Meanwhile, changes to work visas would affect not only legal immigrants currently here on those visas but also business interests that align with at least some in the Trump administration.

This week's orders, on the other hand, don't have natural political constituencies. They deal with immigrants who haven't arrived yet, or with "criminal" unauthorized immigrants. (In practice, the label "criminal" is going to be applied to people who wouldn't meet a commonsense definition of the term, but it's hard to make that case in the abstract.) The orders will be extremely aggressive in practice, but politically they're not fights in which the administration faces powerful antagonists.

President Trump and the White House advisers drafting his executive orders may not see much of a distinction between people currently in the US and those not here yet, or between DREAMers and other unauthorized immigrants. But this week's actions — and inactions — suggest they are at least aware that other people do see that distinction. The question is whether the Trump administration's ideology is strong enough that it's willing to pick the hard fights, too. Watch: The racist history of US immigration policy

Needed: Justice For Immigrants Fighting Deportation

By Jojo Annobil

New York Daily News, January 26, 2017

These are uncertain times for immigrants in America, and the urgent need for free and affordable competent counsel in deportation proceedings has never been more critical. The U.S. government continues to aggressively deport tens of thousands of vulnerable, unaccompanied minor children and mothers with children fleeing extreme violence who do not have the benefit of a lawyer.

Moreover, every year, hundreds of U.S. citizens find themselves mistakenly in deportation proceedings. Green card holders who have no memory of living in another country face deportation based on minor crimes oftentimes committed decades ago.

Although the Supreme Court has recognized that deportation — being torn away from one's family and the life a person has built in America — is a severe penalty, there is currently no right to appointed counsel in deportation proceedings, and 63% of all immigrants are forced to represent themselves, with disastrous consequences.

Against this backdrop, the country is bracing for what may be an unprecedented era of enforcement against immigrants. President Trump and his appointees and advisers have talked about deporting millions of immigrants.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Such a drastic enforcement measure will overwhelm the immigration bar, especially legal services providers and pro bono (volunteer) attorneys who represent immigrants in removal proceedings who cannot afford a lawyer.

Courts have often compared immigration law to the tax code as being one of the most complicated areas of federal law. Even experienced volunteer lawyers who are new to immigration law are only able to take on deportation cases after they go through extensive training and receive mentoring from experienced immigration attorneys.

Immigration judges and even attorneys for the Department of Homeland Security have acknowledged that when immigrants have good lawyers, the deportation proceedings move faster and more efficiently. Those who have no claims to relief or waiver of deportation are more likely to accept deportation quickly, and those who do have a basis to remain in the United States can present their case more effectively.

For immigrants who are detained, giving them lawyers can actually save taxpayers money by moving the case faster and reducing the expense of holding immigrants in jails.

The statistics are daunting. In 2015, unaccompanied minor children forced to represent themselves in immigration court nationwide lost 91% of their cases. But when they have competent counsel, they win 84% of their cases. The children who have arrived recently in the United States are fleeing unspeakable violence inflicted by multinational gangs. Without counsel, they realistically have no chance of avoiding deportation.

Responding to the President's plan to increase immigration enforcement, Gov. Cuomo has proposed an emergency deportation defense fund to assist immigrants in deportation proceedings. The California Legislature and Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Connecticut and Washington, D.C., officials have also announced similar relief funds to protect their immigrant populations. These visionary leaders recognize the importance of counsel in removal proceedings.

The need for representation is great and will likely stretch beyond the resources that these states and cities can make available. Immigrants will need help from municipalities, foundations and private donors to ensure that they get a fair day in court. Innovative approaches are needed to meet a crisis that will only grow in the coming years.

For the past three years, Immigrant Justice Corps, a fellowship program dedicated to improving the quantity and quality of immigration representation, has been training the next generation of immigration lawyers. In two years, the program has impacted the lives of more than 15,000 immigrants residing in New York City, surrounding counties, New Jersey and Texas with 70 justice fellows (law graduates) and community fellows (college graduates). Additional funding could also assist modest-income earners who are ineligible for free legal services and immigrants who believe that paying for aid no matter how modest gets them better treatment.

In 2007, Judge Robert Katzmann (now chief judge) of the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals first challenged the legal profession to meet the representation needs of poor immigrants; justice, he said, should not depend on whether an immigrant can afford a lawyer.

His clarion call rings out loud today. Immigration is America's past, present and future, and we should uphold the core principles of liberty and justice for all.

An Immigrant's Rap Sheet Does Not Preclude A Vigorous Defense

By Heidi Altman

Washington Post, January 26, 2017

D.C. Mayor Muriel E. Bowser (D) recently announced the creation of a legal defense fund for immigrants facing deportation ["New legal fund to aid immigrants," Metro, Jan. 10]. This proposal fills a gap in our federal government's ability to protect due-process rights for all. With no right to appointed counsel for immigrants facing deportation, more than 80 percent of detained immigrants represent themselves in immigration court.

The Jan. 23 editorial "Measured sanctuary" encouraged Ms. Bowser to exempt certain immigrants from receiving representation based on their criminal record. Yet immigrants with criminal convictions often have family members who are U.S. citizens and may be eligible for valid defenses against deportation. Since when do we allow a person's rap sheet to determine whether she or he has the right to a zealous defense in court?

The editorial board conflated legal representation with another aspect of D.C.'s sanctuary policy: the limits imposed on the District's compliance with federal immigration detainer requests. On that question, the board has succumbed to a narrative of fear rather than focusing on sound law and policy. A federal district court recently found Immigration and Customs Enforcement in violation of federal law in its detainer practices. Localities such as the District are acting responsibly when limiting their participation in this federal enforcement program.

Trump's Immigration Order Expands The Definition Of 'Criminal'

By Jennifer Medina

New York Times, January 26, 2017

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

After President Trump signed two sweeping executive orders on immigration on Wednesday, most of the attention was on his plans to build a wall along the border with Mexico and to hold back money from "sanctuary cities." But the most immediate impact may come from language about deportation priorities that is tucked into the border wall order. It offers an expansive definition of who is considered a criminal — a category of people Mr. Trump has said he would target for deportation. Immigration agents will now have wider latitude to enforce federal laws and are being encouraged to deport broad swaths of unauthorized immigrants.

Here are some questions and answers about the changes:

Each presidential administration must decide who it considers a priority for deportation. Mr. Trump's order focuses on anyone who has been charged with a criminal offense, even if it has not led to a conviction. He also includes, according to language in the order, anyone who has "committed acts that constitute a chargeable criminal offense," meaning anyone the authorities believe has broken any type of law — regardless of whether that person has been charged with a crime.

Mr. Trump's order also includes anyone who has engaged in "fraud or willful misrepresentation in connection with any official matter or application before a governmental agency," a category that includes anyone who has used a false Social Security number to obtain a job, as many unauthorized immigrants do. Anyone who has received a final order to leave the country, but has not left, is also considered a priority.

Finally, he allows the targeting of anyone who "in the judgment of an immigration officer" poses a risk to either public safety or national security. That gives immigration officers the broad authority they have been pressing for, and no longer requires them to receive a review from a supervisor before targeting individuals.

The order defines criminal loosely, and includes anyone who has crossed the border illegally — which is a criminal misdemeanor. Anyone who has abused any public benefits program is also considered a criminal under the order.

The Obama administration, which deported nearly 400,000 people per year during its first five years, initially included those convicted of minor offenses such as shoplifting. But it later changed its policy to target primarily those who had been convicted of serious crimes, were considered national security threats or were recent arrivals. By the end of Mr. Obama's time in office, around 90 percent of the country's 11 million undocumented immigrants were not considered a priority for deportation. According to the Migration Policy Institute, a nonpartisan think tank, roughly 820,000 undocumented immigrants currently have a criminal record.

It's impossible to know how many people will be considered priorities for deportation under the new criteria. Mr. Trump's executive order could impact any unauthorized immigrant who is not protected by Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals, which the Obama administration put in place to give young people work permits and temporary relief from deportation. (Mr. Trump has not yet made clear whether he intends to keep that program.) Immigration lawyers have already raised concerns that people with no criminal history will be swept up by the large net the administration is casting.

The president does have the authority to decide who should be deported. But it is unclear whether the administration will be able to — or even try to — carry out deportations as expansively as suggested in the executive order's language. First, in order to put the 15,000 additional immigration agents he wants in place around the country and along the border, Mr. Trump needs spending approval from Congress. Even then, additional detention centers would also be needed.

The most significant hurdle is the tremendous backlog in the immigration courts. Even if immigration officials initiated thousands of deportations immediately, court dates for those immigrants would be at least a year and a half away. Some immigration experts have suggested that Mr. Trump will try to push for expedited removals, which could speed the process, and give immigrants less time to find legal representation.

Mr. Trump is opening the door to deporting far more unauthorized immigrants than previous administrations. "This is the largest expansion of any president in terms of who is a priority for removal," said Steve Yale-Loehr, a professor of immigration law at Cornell University. "Every administration has to prioritize who they will go after with their limited enforcement resources. This goes further than any other president. To make it simple: If someone is here illegally they are removable."

Birmingham Man Indicted On Counterfeiting, Firearms Charges

Gadsden (AL) Times, January 26, 2017

BIRMINGHAM — A federal grand jury on Thursday indicted a Birmingham man on counterfeiting and firearms charges, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Office.

A three-count indictment filed in U.S. District Court charges Hollis Nikia Bullard, 22, with making counterfeit $100 bills, dealing in counterfeit $100 bills and possessing a Smith & Wesson Model 10 revolver as a convicted felon.

According to the indictment, Bullard was convicted of a felony burglary offense in Jefferson County Circuit Court in

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

August 2015, and for felony receipt of stolen property in February 2014.

Police arrested him Jan. 4 on the federal counterfeiting and firearm possession charges at his apartment in Birmingham, where they found counterfeit $100 bills. Secret Service agents recovered counterfeit bills totaling more than $15,000 in the course of the investigation.

The maximum penalty for both making counterfeit U.S. currency and dealing in counterfeit currency is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The maximum penalty for being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm is 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Die! High School Teacher Stages Mock Assassination Of Trump

By Todd Starnes

Fox News, January 26, 2017

A Texas high school art teacher has been placed on administrative leave after video surfaced showing her "shooting" President Donald Trump inside a classroom while screaming, "Die!"

The Secret Service field office in Irving tells me they are aware of the incident, but declined further comment.

Click here to subscribe to Todd's newsletter: a must-read for Conservatives!

The teacher, at W.H. Adamson High School in Dallas, posted the video to her Instagram account along with the following message: "Watching the #inauguration in my classroom like…#no #stop #denial #squirtgun #hypocrisy #powerless #saveusall #teachthembetter #atleastitsfriday."

Voices can be heard in the background – but the school district would not say if students witnessed the teacher's disturbing demonstration.

The Inauguration Day video has since been removed, but several prominent conservative websites managed to save a copy including Town Hall and Resistance Media.

Video of the inauguration was being broadcast inside the classroom on a whiteboard. The video shows the teacher lunging at President Trump and firing the squirt gun numerous times while shouting, "Die!"

It is disturbing, to say the least.

Dallas Independent School District seems to be taking the matter quite seriously.

"Today, we were made aware of a social media posting being circulated involving a teacher at W. H. Adamson High School," a district spokesperson told me. "The teacher has been placed on administrative leave and the district has opened an investigation. This is a personnel matter and as such we cannot comment."

I wonder which offense the school district finds worst: a faux assassination or a teacher using a squirt gun on school property.

Since the 2016 presidential election, liberal educators across the fruited plain have gone slap crazy. I wrote about these phenomena in my new book, "The Deplorables' Guide to Making America Great Again."

Some teachers have even turned their classrooms into breeding grounds for anti-Trump propaganda – going so far as to portray the commander-in-chief as a modern-day Adolf Hitler.

And I lost count of the number of educators who refused to broadcast the inauguration ceremony over fears that some fragile snowflake might take offense.

But what happened in Dallas is yet another example of how our public schools have been turned into social engineering petri dishes festering with rancorous rhetoric and hate.

What kind of a person would stage a faux assassination attempt in of all places Dallas? It's simply repulsive.

Let's hope Dallas ISD can muster the moral courage to take swift action to rebuke this teacher and send a message that this kind of hate has no place in a public school classroom.

Missouri Senate Panel Advances Real ID Compliance Measure

Associated Press, January 26, 2017

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (AP) – A Missouri Senate committee has advanced a proposal that could bring Missouri into compliance with federal driver's license requirements despite some Republican opposition.

The Senate Veterans and Military Affairs Committee voted 4-3 Thursday to send the measure to the full Senate.

Missouri law currently prohibits the state from complying with the federal 2005 Real ID Act, which set tougher proof-of-identity requirements in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks. Opponents have raised privacy concerns about provisions requiring states to keep personal information about license recipients.

The federal government has said driver's licenses from Missouri and other non-compliant states will no longer be accepted as identification at airports starting in January 2018.

The new Missouri legislation would give people a choice of getting licenses that are Real ID compliant or not.

Donald Trump May Be His Own Worst Cyber-Security Threat

By Maya Kosoff

Vanity Fair, January 26, 2017

A not-insignificant portion of Donald Trump's campaign centered on attacking the Democratic candidate for using a personal, private, unsecured communications while she was in office. On the stump, he pledged to investigate and prosecute her for her personal e-mail server, though he's since backed off that promise. One week into his tenure as president, however, Trump appears to still be using private lines of communication himself. Though he was reportedly given a secure device last week, he seems to still have his unsecured phone handy for tweeting purposes. When he tweeted a threat Tuesday night to send "the Feds" into Chicago, astute Twitter users noticed the tweets came from an Android device.

The New York Times reported Wednesday that Trump, to the chagrin of some of his aides, continues to use the unsecured Android phone:

Mr. Trump's wife, Melania, went back to New York on Sunday night with their 10-year-old son, Barron, and so Mr. Trump has the television—and his old, unsecured Android phone, to the protests of some of his aides—to keep him company.

Since becoming president last week, Trump has been tweeting from both the @POTUS Twitter account and his own @realDonaldTrump personal Twitter account, with tweets coming from both an iPhone and an Android device—likely meaning the tweets are sent both by him and also by aides, as they were before inauguration. It's not clear exactly what Android device Trump is using, though Android Central, a blog about the Android operating system, has determined Trump likely uses a Samsung Galaxy S3, which was first released five years ago. "It's safe to say it's a good three years out of step with the latest Android security updates," writer Alex Dobie said.

Twitter users have tried to figure out what email address Trump's Twitter account is tied to, and it seems to be connected to a Gmail address, as opposed to a secure, White House email address. It would also seem that the U.S. president does not have two-factor authentication, a known security feature of Twitter and other websites, enabled.

Users have apparently also tried to guess Trump's Twitter password so many times that they've exceeded the number of password attempts given to a Twitter account.

Trump's limited understanding of the Internet, which he has struggled to describe, and computer technology, which people close to him say he almost never uses, has resulted in a number of clumsy statements on cyber-security, though he has invariably described himself as an expert. In a September debate, he suggested that the party responsible for hacking the Democratic Party over the summer wasn't necessarily a foreign entity like Russia, but "somebody sitting on their bed that weighs 400 pounds." America, Trump went on to say, must "get very, very tough on cyber and cyber-warfare." He then brought up his youngest son, 10-year-old Barron Trump. "He has computers," Trump said. "He is so good with these computers. It's unbelievable. The security aspect of cyber is very, very tough." This idea of "cyber," as Trump refers to it, apparently extends to Trump's yet-unexplained plan to beat the Islamic State. "You know cyber is becoming so big today," he said during an appearance in Virginia in September. "It's becoming something that a number of years ago, a short number of years ago, wasn't even a word. And now the cyber is so big, and you know you look at what they're doing with the Internet. "

The greatest national-security threat to the United States, however, may be Trump: a technology-averse 70-year-old who apparently refuses to part with the consumer-grade device he uses at all hours of the day to blast out market-moving tweets and 140-character missives about nuclear weapons. One imagines it would not be difficult to hack the president, or to mimic his exclamatory, erratic rhetorical style, causing market chaos or, worse, a geopolitical panic. At a minimum, maybe Trump should take some advice from the person who successfully hacked hundreds of Islamic State Twitter accounts and update his security settings. The cyber is "so big," after all.

Trump's Phone: A Cybersecurity Threat?

By Eric Geller

Politico, January 26, 2017

Reports that President Donald Trump has resumed using his Android-powered smartphone are prompting security experts to warn that his Twitter addiction could open up vulnerabilities inside the Oval Office.

The New York Times reported Wednesday that Trump is still using "his old, unsecured Android phone, to the protests of some of his aides," even after a story last week said he had been supplied with "a secure, encrypted device approved by the Secret Service." That alarms experts who note that Android, an operating system developed by Google, is notoriously insecure, especially on older phones that no longer receive software updates from their manufacturers or wireless carriers.

The website Android Central cited photographic evidence to claim that Trump's go-to phone is a Samsung Galaxy S3, a model released in 2012 that has not received software updates since mid-2015. Researchers later uncovered one of the most dangerous Android vulnerabilities, the so-called Stagefright bug, which lets hackers take control of a phone using only a text message.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"It's just crazy that the president is interacting with such an out-of-date and likely insecure device," Matthew Green, a computer science professor at Johns Hopkins University, told POLITICO.

"His off-the-shelf Android could potentially become a room bug without his knowledge," said Bruce Schneier, one of the world's foremost cybersecurity experts. "An attacker could certainly hijack his apps."

The White House and the Secret Service did not respond to requests for comment. A spokeswoman for the Defense Information Systems Agency, which helps secure the president's communications, declined to comment on protective measures.

The continued questions about Trump's phone use come after a presidential campaign in which he and his allies repeatedly accused Hillary Clinton of endangering national security by using a private email server when she was secretary of State. They also alleged, without evidence, that foreign governments had breached the server.

For Trump and his phone, "the real issue is what he does with it," Schneier said in an email. "If he's using it to send and receive classified information, we have a real problem."

That might be unlikely for Trump, who once proclaimed that "no computer is safe" and has suggested that sensitive documents should be sent by courier. News reports say he doesn't use email and that he communicates with aides by scribbling comments on printed documents — rather than tapping out feedback on a smartphone keyboard the way former President Barack Obama often did.

But even if Trump isn't using the phone to send and receive sensitive messages, it still could open up security risks if hackers infect it. For example, they could use the phone to covertly track his location, tweet out fake news about terrorist attacks, or even eavesdrop through the camera and microphone. Depending on how securely the computer networks in the White House have been hardened, any malware already implanted on the phone could possibly roam to other officials' devices.

Even a phone running the latest, most secure version of Android available would still be at risk of being penetrated by foreign intelligence agencies, especially those of Russia and China. While these spies would similarly target an iPhone, security experts say the Apple device is more capable of repelling hackers.

"All of these attacks are possible, and even probable by the big national intelligence agencies," Schneier said.

In addition, the boom in smartphone technology has created a thriving market for the kinds of advanced phone-surveillance tools previously available only to powerful governments. Green said sophisticated criminal gangs could commander an Android device remotely "if there was enough financial incentive."

Trump's tweets frequently indicate that he is using Twitter's Android app, which is usually interpreted as a sign that the messages come from him directly — as opposed to the iPhone often used by his staff. The tweets don't indicate which Android model he is using.

While Android offers users much more flexibility and choice than the operating system that powers Apple's iPhones and iPads, that translates to less-rigorous security controls. Older and less expensive Android phones also lack the iron-clad encryption found on newer iPhones, which even the FBI has complained it's unable to crack.

The NSA has developed and released its own secure version of Android, but it's unclear whether the agency installed it on Trump's phone — or whether the phone is even capable of running it.

"It's pretty obvious that using a 2012-era phone is not a safe thing to do," Green said in an email.

Quantum Computer Worth $15 Million Sold To Tackle Cybersecurity

CNBC, January 26, 2017

A state-of-the-art computer system using quantum mechanics and valued at $15 million dollars has been sold to a cyber-security firm.

D-Wave, the developers of the quantum computer, announced the sale to Temporal Defense Systems , earlier this week. Temporal Defense Systems are the first customers for the D-Wave 2000Q Quantum Computer. Previous D-Wave customers include Lockheed Martin, Google and NASA.

D-Wave claims that using the quantum computer will enable the cyber security firm to perform real-time security level rating, device-to-device authentication and identify, detect and prevent threats.

D-Wave

The D-Wave 2000Q Quantum Computer

Dr Michael Green, of AI media platform Blackwood Seven, explained the difference between a quantum and a normal computer.

A standard computer uses binary data: every bit of data is either a one or a zero. Multiple bits are used to store memory, but each bit can only be in one state (position one or position zero) at any time.

"A quantum computer works totally differently, because you replace the bit with something called a qubit," Green told CNBC during a phone interview last year.

"The good thing about it is it can be in both states at the same time, so that means that if add, for example, five bits… that means that computer can be in 32 states at the same time. If you have five bits in a normal computer, it can still only be in one state at a time."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

This means a quantum computer could perform 32 calculations at the same time as a normal computer performs one. That may not sound impressive, but the more bits that are added, the more calculations that can be done at once.

The D-Wave 2000Q Quantum Computer is claimed to have 2,000 qubits. D-Wave claims it was able to solve challenging problems 1,000 to 10,000 times faster than algorithms running on a server.

"We are the only company selling quantum computers, and our growing ecosystem of users and developers gives us the benefit of their practical experience as we develop products to solve real-world problems," said Vern Brownell, D-Wave's chief executive, said in a press release.

"While other organizations have prototypes with just a few qubits in their labs, D-Wave is delivering the systems, software, training, and services needed to build an industry."

Applying quantum computing to cyber security will be revolutionary, according to James Burrell, Temporal Defense Systems' chief technology officer.

"Combining the unique computational capabilities of a quantum computer with the most advanced cyber security technologies will deliver the highest level of security, focused on both prevention and attribution of cyber attacks," he said in a press release.

AT&T Slams FCC's Cybersecurity Claims, Says It Has Resources To Thwart Attacks

By Sean Buckley

Fierce Telecom, January 26, 2017

AT&T is fighting back against claims made by the FCC that the telecom community lacks the capability to protect consumers and business customers from cyberattacks.

The FCC recently issued a white paper on "Cybersecurity Risk Reduction" that raised several issues around the role of internet service providers (ISPs) in cybersecurity.

According to the regulator, the rising tide of cyberattacks over the past decade signals a new approach is needed.

Specifically, the FCC said that because large ISPs hold strong market power, cyber threats are not relegated to those providers alone. Consumers could be caught in the middle because they might not be able to choose an ISP that has better or different security practices.

Second, the FCC said that individual service providers can't overcome marketwide barriers in order to strengthen security. The regulator suggested that "broader action" may be needed "by voluntary industry associations and/or by government action" to improve cybersecurity preparedness in the communications industry.

"When deciding how much to invest to reduce cyber risk, the cost-benefit analysis of ISPs naturally considers the risks to the firm," the FCC said in its paper. "Unfortunately, relying on market forces alone fails to adequately weigh the risks imposed on third parties who rely on the networks and services they provision. A cybersecurity gap confronts the public." AT&T disputes 'bold assertions'

However, AT&T disagrees with the FCC's assertions about its cybersecurity capabilities.

In a blog post, the service provider takes issue over two claims the FCC made in its paper: service providers like AT&T don't have the incentives to protect its network and customers from cyberattacks, and the regulator's authority over cybersecurity.

"The Bureau makes bold assertions but doesn't provide any evidence that there are a lack of incentives for carriers to protect their networks from cyberattacks," said Chris Boyer, assistant VP of global public policy for AT&T in the post. "Instead it relies on already-debunked assumptions that there is inadequate competition in the broadband marketplace, and then leaps to the conclusion that ISPs therefore won't invest in protecting their networks and customers from cyberattacks." Expertise growing

Being a large carrier, AT&T said it has employed a staff of security experts to analyze network traffic 24/7/365 to understand and identify emerging threats.

Today, AT&T has eight global security operation centers and holds 179 security and privacy patents. In order to keep up with new threats, AT&T has a "fleet" of cybersecurity experts, and it is actively training and retraining employees to increase its security staff.

On an average day, AT&T said that the telco's security experts see more than 30 billion vulnerability scans and 400 million spam messages "cross its global IP network every day." Interestingly, the increase of Internet of things (IoT) devices over the past three years has driven a 3,198% rise in vulnerability scans.

Boyer said, "we're well aware of the threats to our network and our customers, and are taking meaningful steps to counter these risks."

Here Are The 5 Scariest Revelations From Pew's New Cybersecurity Survey

Fast Company, January 26, 2017

A new survey from the Pew Research Center finds that most American adults have been the victims of some kind of

"major data breach," and that many of us don't trust big organizations to keep our data safe. Here's some of the more alarming numbers from the report:

• 41% of those surveyed reported having fraudulent charges on their credit cards

• 39% of respondents say they reuse passwords across accounts, and 41% have shared at least one password with a friend or relative

• 16% say someone has hijacked their email accounts, and 13% say one of their social media accounts has been hacked.

• 15% say they've gotten notice that their Social Security numbers were compromised

• 51% of respondents said they're "not at all confident" or "not too confident" in social media sites keeping their information safe—and 49% feel that way about the federal government.

Explaining Cybersecurity Threats In A Decision-maker Context – GCN

By Marvin Marin

Government Computer News, January 26, 2017

As cybersecurity professionals, I'm sure you've had this experience: you find a risk to your organization's systems, data and reputation, and you want to take action – recode, deploy a web application firewall or maybe even disconnect the system.

You don't want to make it sound like the sky is falling, but you need time and resources to correct the issue – now. You discuss the vulnerability with your team, and everyone agrees that the issue is urgent and must be remediated. You take your assessment of the vulnerability to leadership and say, "We have to take our system down. It has a blind SQL injection vulnerability that can be used to steal our data, passwords and allow an adversary to move laterally through our network." To cybersecurity professionals the problem is clear, and the decision should be easy to make.

The decision maker listens to you describe the problem and says, "That is the most important system we have. Build a plan of action and milestone, and we'll get the authorizing official to accept the risk and keep the system up."

You walk away knowing that nothing has been fixed – that a piece of paper won't keep your system secure and your agency is now vulnerable to a loss of data and customer trust when the inevitable breach makes the news.

As frustrating as this situation may be, the blame can't rest solely on management's shoulders; perhaps cyber professionals should accept part of the blame. Cyber professionals have a responsibility to identify and assess risk, but problems won't be remediated effectively until they can be explained in a way that can be understood and acted on by leadership. Putting cyber risk in context and communicating it effectively makes cyber professionals the source of real, relevant, reliable threat information. Effective communication helps senior executives balance the risks of the vulnerability with the need to sustain system availability.

Because members of an effective team, from management to the mailroom, all have their own areas of responsibility and their own language, views and understanding of risks, threats and costs, they may not immediately understand your perspective. To effectively communicate vulnerabilities, the risks they pose and the threats to the organization, you must understand what senior leaders are concerned about: the availability of critical systems, mission sustainment, the potential loss in dollars (from system recovery, fines, overtime, etc.) and the probability of exploit.

Once you grasp their language, views and understanding, you must be able to explain how the vulnerability you've unearthed will impact everyone else in the organization, what data and systems are at risk and the potential cost of being compromised. While you may have a complete understanding of the data on your systems and its potential vulnerabilities, others in your organization may not. It's up to you to communicate the impact across all missions and business functions.

In short, you must connect the dots for senior leaders, mission owners, chief financial officers and other executives. Show them how the compromise of one application or system can mean much more than that – the potential compromise of every bit of data on every system in your entire organization.

Revisiting the same problem from this different direction will better illustrate the impact of a newfound vulnerability.

Your assessment found a blind SQL injection on a public-facing web application. You note that the system is hosting personally identifiable information and that there are PII records for 512,000 users in the database across all major business lines (finance, operations, logistics, etc.) in your organization. Your research shows that the cost of recovery from loss of one PII record is around $221, making the total cost well over $113 million. You have your team quickly draft a proof-of-concept exploit to extract records from the affected database to prove that the vulnerability is real.

A quick Google search for the site with the vulnerability reveals a discussion board that says, "It looks like system X has a blind SQL injection issue; has anyone figured out how to exploit it?"

You now have the data you need to communicate the scope of the problem in the terms that are important to management.

"We have a critical issue with system X. We know it is hosting PII, with a potential data breach price tag of $113 million. Additionally, there is evidence this system is being targeted by hackers. We should act rapidly to fix this." From there, you could recommend actions that are far less expensive than the cost of recovering from a data breach:

Removing external web access and working with the program manager or system owner to fix the source code (emergency maintenance window).

Deploying a web application firewall to provide virtual patching and detection/prevention of threats.

By speaking to management's concerns, you have gained leadership's attention and established the potential cost if the vulnerability is exploited. You have proved you understand their needs and have shown how your work can support their decision making by providing realistic, actionable solutions that will keep your organization secure.

As cyber professionals, it's our job not only to find vulnerabilities, but also to help decision makers understand the nature, impact and context of each as well as help them understand the available courses of action and their relative costs, impacts and benefits. We must learn to place cyber issues in the language and context of our business or mission leaders. In doing so, cybersecurity teams will gain increased credibility, decrease attack surfaces and help decision makers understand critical tradeoffs – all toward the goal of improving the organization's security posture.

Executive leadership drives the business and sometimes accepts operational risk as part of the normal business process, but it's up to cyber professionals to communicate findings effectively, with context and in terms best understood by senior executives, to ensure timely and effective action.

New CIA Director Inherits An Agency That Is Quickly Developing Cyber Capabilities

By Chris Bing

CyberScoop, January 26, 2017

The CIA's Directorate of Digital Innovation is now delivering the kinds of cyber-espionage tools and intelligence-gathering capabilities that the agency was seeking when then-Director John Brennan created it two years ago, says a senior official with the program.

The unit has moved beyond its initial period of integration with the spy agency, said Sean Roche, the DDI's associate deputy director. It's now "delivering capabilities that will enable CIA to transform the business of intelligence," he said, at a time when the CIA is transitioning to new leadership.

"We are creating agile digital environments to enhance our ability to collaborate as an Agency and Intelligence Community," Roche said. "The vision is to create pathways for persistent clandestine and open-source collection that feed data exploitation and curation."

The Langley, Virginia-based office's mission is to streamline and integrate digital and cybersecurity capabilities into the CIA's espionage, counterintelligence, all-source analysis, open-source intelligence collection and covert action operations.

The DDI's progress also comes as Donald Trump's administration evaluates the role, responsibility and mission of nearly every federal organization. On Monday, the Senate confirmed Trump's pick to replace Brennan, Mike Pompeo.

"The DDI is firing on all cylinders," Roche said of the unit's momentum.

Pompeo, formerly a House member from Kansas, steps into Langley with the benefit of a DDI that has been working for more than a year to broadly modernize the premier U.S. intelligence agency — an effort that includes the adoption of cloud data-storage technologies and secure dev-ops coding projects, as well as "digital collaboration environments and mobility through wireless," Roche said.

Roche is a career federal employee with 35 years of service in the government. Prior to his current job, he held various executive positions with the Homeland Security Department's Directorate for Science and Technology — a research and development arm with a national security focus. Roche's boss, DDI Director Andrew Hallman, is CIA veteran with decades of leadership experience.

"A digital world challenges the way we work in a clandestine world. We have to come up with new ways to operate in a much more connected environment and still be clandestine," Hallman said in an interview with DefenseOne. "The way we help people use digital and cyber techniques, [the DDI] will raise it to a new level."

Last summer, Brennan said the DDI would help the spy agency succeed in an era of "big data," which requires that analysts mine through vast volumes of digital information to find actionable intelligence.

"I felt a special responsibility since I served 25 years in CIA to do what I could here on the organizational front to make sure that we're postured well for the future," Brennan said in a December interview with NPR. "I've talked to Mike [Pompeo] about the modernization program we have underway here. He is very familiar with it … I told him that to me, the modernization process should never end because we have to constantly adapt to the realities that we have to deal with in the outside world."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The launch of the DDI represented the CIA's first new Directorate since 1963.

Little is known about how the office specifically functions or if it deploys "offensive" cyber capabilities.

The CIA declined to discuss whether the DDI's staff size has grown since the unit's conception in early 2015.

Publicly viewable CIA job postings show that the spy agency is currently hiring for digital forensic engineers, cyberthreat analysts, cybersecurity officers and operations officers. Qualified applicants for these positions will come with some knowledge of "network penetration testing, network defense, operating systems, communication technologies, network security" and "reverse engineering."

In the past, the CIA has traditionally worked "very closely with the intelligence community and law enforcement colleagues, including the NSA, FBI, Homeland Security Department, and other agencies, to address" cyberthreats aimed at the U.S., said CIA spokesperson Heather Fritz Horniak.

One of the CIA's primary responsibilities pertaining to cybersecurity includes the collection of human and digital, or signals, intelligence to identify foreign hackers. What sets the CIA apart from its counterparts is the agency's ability to collect human intelligence from a clandestine network of agents operating around the globe.

"Cyber-defense is very much a team sport across the [government]. As an all-source overseas collector, CIA leverages the widest range of HUMINT, collection platforms, and technical capabilities to discover the plans and intentions of hostile foreign cyber actors," Horniak said. "The intelligence reports generated by DDI officers inform our partners across the federal government in order to support their cyber-incident responses."

According to classified budget documents shared with the Washington Post, the CIA's computer network operations budget for fiscal year 2013 was $685.4 million. The NSA's budget was roughly $1 billion at the time.

Connected Cars Are Ripe For Hacking

By Dan Steiner

CIO Magazine, January 26, 2017

Technology has taken over almost every area of consumers' lives, from the way they work and play to the toys their children use. In addition to finding ways to connect homes to the internet, innovators have also begun developing software and hardware for the cars people drive every day. When a vehicle can connect to the internet, automakers can build in amenities that make their products more desirable to consumers.

But like the many other devices that can communicate, connected vehicles bring security issues. As connected cars gradually become more mainstream, it's important that consumers be aware of the dangers they face from a security breach.

The dangers

Last year, the FBI, Department of Transportation, and National Highway Traffic Safety Administration issued a memo warning of the dangers of connected vehicles. One of the most eminent threats, as detailed in the memo, is the possibility of a takeover of the car's operations. A hacker could find his or her way into a vehicle's computer and take control, leading to an accident. A hacker could disable a vehicle's brakes or steering or could shut the engine down completely. On a less threatening level, a hacker could also manipulate a vehicle's door locks, turn signal, radio, GPS, or other on-board system.

Now that cars are connected, police departments are also concerned about vehicle theft. Using laptops, thieves can bypass a vehicle's ignition system and steal a car. The software is similar to that used by dealers and locksmiths to program an ignition for a car owner, so it can be difficult to prevent such attacks. This type of attack applies especially to those who own cars with keyless entry and ignition.

Any connection that can be intercepted can be prone to viruses and data breaches, which means that any information stored on that device could be stolen, including credit card numbers and contact data. As automotive software becomes more sophisticated, hackers will be able to collect even more information on a person's life, leading to increased concerns about identity theft. While this isn't as concerning as a remote vehicle takeover, it's a real issue that automakers will need to safeguard against in the coming years.

The solution

All of this information is useless if it doesn't include actionable advice. Currently, vehicle software updates are handled two ways: through being pushed to your car's software and through automotive recalls. Software updates are the ideal scenario, since car owners aren't required to take the car to the dealership for service. Vehicle owners will increasingly notice software updates installing when they start their car. When automotive manufacturers are proactive about preventing malware and third-party vehicle takeovers, they'll protect themselves against the reputation damage that comes from a breach.

In addition to keeping a vehicle safe, in time the software could be set up to help consumers. As one expert pointed out, when a vehicle's software detects a maintenance issue, its driver could receive a notification of nearby dealerships offering deals on that service at that time. This would provide a level of usability that would increase a customer's loyalty to a specific make of car.

Dealer recalls

For those updates that can't be automatically pushed, a visit to the dealer is the only option. Auto manufacturers send recalls that urge owners of certain vehicle makes and models to visit the dealer as soon as possible for an update. Once in the hands of a dealership, the vehicle's software can be updated using certified software.

Unfortunately, many car owners ignore recalls. According to J.D. Power, more than 45 million vehicles that were recalled due to safety issues between 2013 were not brought in for service. One of the biggest reasons for the lethargy is the sheer volume of annual recalls. When a car owner only sees one recall over the course of owning a vehicle, for instance, it's much more likely to be taken seriously than when those recalls are coming at a pace of one per month. This apathy highlights the importance of finding a way to automate software updates rather than rely on the car being physically present in the dealership.

Automotive software will only become more sophisticated over time. If manufacturers take steps to ensure consumers remain safe in the process, they can win brand loyalty and improve usability.

Federal Lawmakers Introduce Bipartisan Bill To Study Cyber Security In Connected Cars

By Jillian Stampher

GeekWire, January 26, 2017

Connected cars are the future for the automotive industry, with more than 90 percent of vehicles expected to have built-in connectivity by 2020. But, as more vehicles link up to the internet, lawmakers are worried about their security.

On Wednesday, lawmakers introduced a bipartisan bill in the U.S. House of Representatives that would direct the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) to study cyber security in vehicles. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-SC, and Rep. Ted Lieu, D-Calif., co-sponsored The Security and Privacy in Your Car Study Act, which hopes to create a standard for safety in connected cars.

The bill requires the NHTSA to work with the Defense Department, the Federal Trade Commission, the National Institute of Standards and Technology, the Automotive Information Sharing and Analysis Center, SAE International, academics and manufacturers in the automotive industry.

Together, the group would study how to isolate software systems in vehicles, create a system to prevent and detect hacks, determine best practices for storing data and create a timeline for how to implement these standards.

"It's something of a daunting challenge to balance disruptive technological innovation with federal safety and privacy protections," Rep. Wilson and Rep. Lieu wrote in an April 2016 op-ed in The Hill. "As a result, all applicable government agencies need to be on the same page when assessing a cyber threat or measuring a cyberattack."

Concerns about security in cars connected to the internet comes at a time when the automotive and tech industries are investing more into the platform. Tesla has long had a hold on the market, but in the last several years, it's seen significant growth. Tech giants Apple and Google are pushing against automakers Ford, GM and Toyota to gain ground. Earlier this month, Microsoft announced it's creating a set of services for automakers to use in connected cars, shifting away from creating it's own such vehicle.

In her blog post announcing the new platform, Peggy Johnson, Microsoft's executive vice president of business development, said that the infrastructure needed to build a connected car is "incredibly complicated. By partnering with automakers, Microsoft can handle the data, the automotive manufacturers focus on the safety of the vehicle.

Safety continues to be a main concern with connected cars. In 2015, Chrysler recalled 1.4 million vehicles after WIRED released a video showing hackers taking control of a Jeep and driving into a ditch.

Rep. Wilson and Rep. Lieu seek to address such concerns by creating industry-wide standard for connected cars. If enacted, the NHTSA study will be conducted over the course of one year and then be presented to Congress.

"The public and private sectors must work together to ensure that a car can never become a weapon," the congressmen wrote in The Hill last year. "It remains critical that the federal government leverage the expertise and research that the private sector has already invested in this critical issue."

DCC Earns Designation As National Center Of Excellence In Cyber Defense

By Trevor Metcalfe

Danville (VA) Register & Bee., January 26, 2017

Gov. Terry McAuliffe announced the National Security Agency and the U.S. Department of Homeland Security had officially designated Danville Community College as a National Center of Academic Excellence in Cyber Defense at a DCC event Thursday.

"This prestigious designation is not only good news for DCC, it is good news for the commonwealth," McAuliffe said.

The governor made the announcement to a room filled with DCC students and staff, Danville and Pittsylvania County elected officials, Danville and Pittsylvania County school leaders and McAuliffe administration officials.

To earn the distinction, DCC and its cyber security program had to demonstrate significant contributions in areas like cyber security education, outreach and knowledge. DCC is now one of only four schools in Virginia with this designation.

McAuliffe said he believed the program would help transform the workforce into one ready for some of the highest paying and widest available jobs anywhere in the country.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"I talk about cyber security every single day," McAuliffe said.

According to McAuliffe, there are around 3,600 unfilled cyber security jobs available today in Virginia with an average starting salary of $88,000. They help guard against cyber attacks on personal data, medical records, bank accounts and other types of data.

"These are the jobs of the 21st century," McAuliffe said.

Additionally, McAuliffe said many of the jobs could be performed remotely, making it perfect for rebuilding areas of the state like Southwest Virginia and the Dan River Region.

"You can do these jobs everywhere," he said.

DCC Professor and Cyber Center Director Steve Carrigan started working on the receiving the designation in 2015. Then, he wasn't sure if he would be able to complete the long, arduous process.

"The past 18 months have been something else," Carrigan said.

Carrigan said he was also proud of many of his alumni.

"In fact, some of them are now coming back and hiring current graduates," Carrigan said.

DCC student David Payne came to the school in 2015 in search of a new career and a new start. After just a few months in the program, he was hired by Hewlett Packard Enterprise as an IT specialist.

"I would not be where I am today without Danville Community College's information technology and cybersecurity programs, which gave me the technical skills and know how to make a career out of doing what I love," he said.

Doomsday Clock Ticks Closer To Apocalypse And 1 Person Is To Blame

By Mary Bowerman

USA Today, January 26, 2017

Scientists moved the hands of the Doomsday Clock closer to midnight on Thursday amid increasing worries over nuclear weapons and climate change.

Each year, the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, a nonprofit that sets the clock, decides whether the events of the previous year pushed humanity closer or further from destruction. The symbolic clock is now two-and-a-half minutes from midnight, the closest it's been to midnight since 1953, when the hydrogen bomb was first tested. Scientists blamed a cocktail of threats ranging from dangerous political rhetoric to the potential of nuclear threat as the catalyst for moving the clock closer towards doomsday.

"This year's Clock deliberations felt more urgent than usual…as trusted sources of information came under attack, fake news was on the rise, and words were used by a President-elect of the United States in cavalier and often reckless ways to address the twin threats of nuclear weapons and climate change," Rachel Bronson, the executive director and publisher of Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, said in a statement.

While many threats played into the decision to move the clock 30 seconds forward from where it was in 2016, one person in particular prompted the scientists to act.

"Never before has the Bulletin decided to advance the clock largely because of the statements of a single person. But when that person is the new president of the United States, his words matter," David Titley and Lawrence M. Krauss of the Bulletin wrote in an New York Times op-ed.

The Bulletin pointed to President Donald Trump's careless rhetoric on nuclear weapons and other issues as well as his troubling stance on climate change.

"Current political situation in the U.S. is of particular concern," Titley of the Bulletin Science and Security Board said. "The Trump administration needs to state clearly, unequivocally it accepts climate change caused by human activity…There are no alternative facts here."

Last year, the clock remained at three minutes from midnight. It was moved to three minutes in 2015 where it was previously at five minutes to midnight.

Manhattan Project scientists, concerned about the first atomic weapons, founded the nonprofit Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists in 1945. They created the clock two years later, and update its minute hand each year.

According to the group, the clock "conveys how close we are to destroying our civilization with dangerous technologies of our own making."

The threat of nuclear warfare plays heavily into the time on the clock, as do the dangers of climate change the threat from cyber technology, according to the group's website.

The decision is made by the board of the nonprofit Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists' along with input from a board of sponsors which includes 15 Nobel Laureates, according to the group.

Doomsday Clock Moves Closer To Midnight, Signaling Concern Among Scientists

By Jonah Engel Bromwich

New York Times, January 26, 2017

It is getting closer to midnight.

On Thursday, the group of scientists who orchestrate the Doomsday Clock, a symbolic instrument informing the public when the earth is facing imminent disaster, moved its minute hand from three to two and a half minutes before the final hour.

It was the closest the clock had been to midnight since 1953, the year after the United States and the Soviet Union conducted competing tests of the hydrogen bomb.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Though scientists decide on the clock's position, it is not a scientific instrument, or even a physical one. The movement of its symbolic hands is decided upon by the Science and Security Board of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. The organization introduced the clock on the cover of its June 1947 edition, placing it at seven minutes to midnight. Since then, it has moved closer to midnight and farther away, depending on the board's conclusions.

Thursday's announcement was made by Rachel Bronson, the executive director and publisher of the bulletin. She was assisted by the theoretical physicist Lawrence Krauss, the climate scientist and meteorologist David Titley, and the former United States ambassador Thomas Pickering.

Ms. Bronson, in a post-announcement interview, explained why the board had included the 30 second mark in the measurement. She said that it was an attention-catching signal that was meant to acknowledge "what a dangerous moment we're in, and how important it is for people to take note."

"We're so concerned about the rhetoric, and the lack of respect for expertise, that we moved it 30 seconds," she said. "Rather than create panic, we're hoping that this drives action."

In an op-ed for The New York Times, Mr. Titley and Mr. Krauss elaborated on their concerns, citing the increasing threats of nuclear weapons and climate change, as well as President Trump's pledges to impede what they see as progress on both fronts, as reasons for moving the clock closer to midnight.

"Never before has the Bulletin decided to advance the clock largely because of the statements of a single person," they wrote. "But when that person is the new president of the United States, his words matter."

The board has held the responsibility for the clock's movements since 1973, when the bulletin's editor, Eugene Rabinowitch, died. Composed of scientists, and nuclear and climate experts, the board meets biannually to discuss where the clock's hands should fall in light of world events.

In the 1950s, the scientists feared nuclear annihilation, and since then, the board has begun to consider other existential threats, including climate change, compromised biosecurity and artificial intelligence.

There were crises that the clock was not quick enough to take into account. The Cuban Missile Crisis, for instance, in 1962, did not change the hands of the clock, which at the time stood at seven minutes to midnight.

An explanation on the Bulletin's website accounts for this seeming lapse in timekeeping: "The Cuban Missile Crisis, for all its potential and ultimate destruction, only lasted a few weeks," it says. "However, the lessons were quickly apparent when the United States and the Soviet Union installed the first hotline between the two capitals to improve communications, and, of course, negotiated the 1963 test ban treaty, ending all atmospheric nuclear testing."

The end of the Cold War came as a relief to those who had lived in fear of nuclear annihilation for decades, and the minute hand slowly moved away from danger. In 1990, it was at 10 minutes to midnight. The next year, it was a full 17 minutes away, at the relatively undisturbing time of 11:43.

"The illusion that tens of thousands of nuclear weapons are a guarantor of national security has been stripped away," the Bulletin said at the time.

But over the next two decades the clock slowly ticked back. Conflict between India and Pakistan, both of whom staged nuclear weapons tests three weeks apart, had the clock at nine minutes to midnight in 1998. By 2007, fears about Iranian and North Korean nuclear capacity had pushed it to 11:55.

By 2015, the scientists were back in a state of unmitigated concern, with the clock at three minutes to midnight, the closest it had been since 1984.

"Unchecked climate change, global nuclear weapons modernizations, and outsized nuclear weapons arsenals pose extraordinary and undeniable threats to the continued existence of humanity," the bulletin said. "World leaders have failed to act with the speed or on the scale required to protect citizens from potential catastrophe."

"These failures of political leadership endanger every person on Earth," it added.

Atomic Scientists Move Doomsday Clock Closer To Midnight: Apocalypse Now?

A group of Nobel laureates believe the world is a less safe place with Trump in the White House.

A group of Nobel laureates believes the world has inched a step closer to the apocalypse after the swearing in of President Donald Trump.

The Bulletin of Atomic Scientists – which for 70 years has maintained a symbolic "Doomsday Clock" – announced Thursday that they believe a combination of international stressors and Trump's position in the White House could bring about the end of days.

The figurative clock reads like an analog clock face, with midnight symbolizing the end of the world.

Founded by a group of University of Chicago scientists who worked on The Manhattan Project's first atomic weapons, the Bulletin's members now believe humanity is two and a half minutes to midnight.

"Over the course of 2016, the global security landscape darkened as the international community failed to come effectively to grips with humanity's most pressing existential threats, nuclear weapons and climate change," the group said in a statement. "This already-threatening world situation was the backdrop for a rise in strident nationalism worldwide in 2016, including in a U.S. presidential campaign during which the eventual victor, Donald Trump, made disturbing comments about the use and proliferation of nuclear weapons and expressed disbelief in the overwhelming scientific consensus on climate change."

The scientists laid out a laundry list of international issues that could expedite the world's end, including conflict in Syria and Ukraine, North Korea's nuclear and missile testing, tension between India and Pakistan, doubt over the future of the Iran nuclear deal and the complicated relationship between the U.S. and Russia.

Two of the scientists wrote in a New York Times op-ed Thursday that Trump's election could further complicate this volatile world stage.

"We understand that Mr. Trump has been in office only days, that many of his cabinet nominees are awaiting confirmation and that he has had little time to take official action," they said. "But Mr. Trump's statements and actions have been unsettling. He has made ill-considered comments about expanding and even deploying the American nuclear arsenal."

[RELATED: Dow 20,000: Does It Matter, and What Happens Next?]

The scientists also put strong emphasis on climate change in their Doomsday Clock assessments – an issue that Trump and some of his cabinet members haven't exactly supported. The Trump administration earlier this week put a gag order on scientists at the Environmental Protection Agency and was reportedly looking into stripping down a significant portion of the EPA's website. Trump suggested in a meeting with business leaders that environmental regulations have gotten "out of control," and his pick to head the EPA, Scott Pruitt, has questioned human impact on climate change.

None of this likely sat well with a group of scientists that believes climate change is up there with nuclear weapons as "humanity's most pressing existential threats," per the group's statement.

But the scientists' move was a relatively small one – only 30 seconds on the Doomsday Clock. This was the first time the group inched their Armageddon projections forward by a fraction of a minute. The board based its decision on the fact that Trump has only been in the White House for "a matter of days."

"Just the same, words matter, and President Trump has had plenty to say over the last year," the statement said. "Both his statements and his actions as president-elect have broken with historical precedent in unsettling ways."

Still, the scientists stopped short of saying Trump will definitively bring about the end of the world. The clock was only two minutes to midnight – slightly closer than it is now – back in 1953, when the U.S. and the Soviet Union both tested thermonuclear weapons in a relatively short span of time.

The world obviously didn't end back then, so it may be premature to head to the bunker just yet. But the Nobel prize-winning scientists believe the end of days is slightly closer than it was a year ago.

The Doomsday Clock Is About To Be Updated For The First Time Since Trump Started Talking About Nuclear Weapons

By W.j. Hennigan, Contact Reporter

Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2017

President Trump's comments about the U.S. nuclear weapons arsenal have for months rattled arms-control advocates about how his administration might change half a century of policy and posture.

On Thursday, the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists will weigh in with its annual assessment, the iconic Doomsday Clock.

The metaphorical clock shows how close the world is to "midnight," or a worldwide catastrophe. The closest the clock has ever been was 2 minutes to midnight in 1953 in the early days of above-ground hydrogen bomb testing. It held steady last year, after ticking down to 3 minutes to midnight in 2015.

The group, started by physicists who built the atomic bomb as part of the Manhattan Project, makes its decision principally based on the possible use of nuclear weapons, but includes climate change and technologies that could inflict irrevocable harm, whether by intention, miscalculation or accident.
